SKIN-ANN

"I'll buy back the 200 acres of the plantation you've had to sell and deed it to you, and on the day Lillah marries me I'll settle enough money on you to enable you to live as you used to live."

The Vinnege family—old, Alicia, a vertebrae Miner in her stoniness and strength, London, her son, and Lillah, her young granddaughter—sat in the evening shadows on the plantation house's wide gallery, listening to the propositions of Nicholas Hopson, a neighboring planter, a hard-headed bachelor of 40.

There were two other listeners to Nicholas' offer. Vashli, a black girl, the black mountain who cooked for the Vinneges, standing back in the wide hall, out of sight of the "white folks," and Skin-Ann, the 13-year-old granddaughter of Aunt Vashli, sitting on the sand under the high gallery, her woolly head close to the open lattice around its edge.

"Miss Lillah—my darlin' Miss Lillah!" she groaned under her breath, "rest as soft and tender and easy to put on by dem old tarribles as a butterfly! De'v'el make her consent to take Nick Hopson, wid his hard eye and his ball' head, and huh a-lovin' Mistuh Lockard all de time!"

"An hour later, when Skin-Ann stole into Lillah's room, the girl sat on her bed crying in a heartbroken fashion. "They made me do it, Skin-Ann!" She held up her slender left hand, on which, in an old-fashioned diamond setting, was a magnificent diamond solitaire. "When Nicholas took out this thing grandmother put it on my finger, and then he kissed me; and after Nicholas left, when I told them I'd promised to marry Lynn just as soon as he got enough saved at his bookkeeping to rent us a house and furnish it, they said I must never see or speak to Lynn again! Oh, Skin-Ann, what must I do? If mother hadn't died, I'd have somebody to help me!"

"You got me to help you, Miss Lillah, darlin'!" The lean creature crouched down by Lillah's knees. Lillah wiped her eyes. "Couldn't you take a note to Lynn early in the morning for me, Skin-Ann?"

"The next noon, just beyond the Vinnege plantation house, a young fellow waited, his brown eyes deep and serious. Before the girl, trembling and glancing fearfully about her, reached him, she held up her left hand. "Oh Lillah," he reproached her. "I had to do it, Lynn!" she faulted. "I had to put it on, but it's nothing—nothing to me!"

Young Lockard pondered anxiously. "You love me, and you're going to marry nobody else, Lillah," he asked. "Nobody but you!" she cried, laying her face against his shoulder. "Then it's all right," he said happily. "If it will keep the peace until I get back for you to wear Hopson's ring, or borrow money from old Kungso on the stone—he'll lend me $200 or so on it—and I'm going to Alaska and bring back enough gold to buy back your father's land and do every thing for them that Nick Hopson can do."

The girl's pluck cheeks lost their color. "To Alaska!" she gasped. "Oh, Lynn, you might not come back. And your mother's ring—your mother's engagement ring!"

"My sweet dear mother wouldn't care, lovely," he said slowly. "She'd want us to be happy!"

She knew very well how to twist a sleeping chicken's neck to render it dumb.

When the red glow in the east told that the day was not far off an utterly exhausted Skin-Ann, wet to the waist, her bare feet bleeding from the hooked grass burrs they had encountered, laid her hand on Lillah's shoulder. "Weep up, missy!" she breathes, "and come wid me! I believe 's on de track o' dat lost diamond!"

When the sun came up its first rays fell on a wonderful stone in Lillah's hand—a big diamond Skin-Ann had drawn from the inner man of the tenth Rhode Island Red victim!

And while Lillah looked at it and cried, a messenger boy rode into the yard and handed her a bit of yellow paper. "I've struck it rich, sweet-heart," it read, "and I start home today."
