RECLAIMING EGYPT'S SOIL.
Surprising Results in Cotton Shown by Lord Kitchener.

Lord Kitchener lectured before the International Congress on Tropical Agriculture at the Imperial Institute, London recently, and showed how 800 acres of absolute waste land at Biala on the Nile Delta had been made to produce comparatively large crops of cotton by a new system of irrigation.

He said that the modern cultivation of cotton in Egypt dated only from 1821, but for years it did not make much progress on account of the deterioration of the land thereby produced and the constant care that the crops demanded. Science, he said had at length come to the rescue, of Egyptian cotton by developing the industry along the following lines:

(1) The pure strains of the cotton seed in the country, which was liable to deterioration every seven years.
(2) The regulation and improvement of irrigation and drainage.
(3) The proper cultivation and manuring of the land and the rotation of crops.
(4) The incessant war that has to be waged against insect pests.

done by treating Egyptian soils in a scientific manner. Lord Kitchener then described the experiment at Biala: The system of irrigation and drainage laid out on the land, he said, $50 an acre, and the land was then handed over to the fellahs in five-acre plots for cultivation. They had to clean and level their plots, which were made over to them on a special tenure. Last year the land was washed and a crop of rice was grown, with the resulting purification of the land above described.

In this case, said Lord Kitchener, to the great astonishment of the fellahs cultivators, a permanent result had been achieved in one year, which, under the ordinary system prevailing in the country, would have taken at least three or four years to accomplish, and even then, without adequate drainage, the land would have been liable to go back to its original state. Cotton was now being satisfactorily grown in a large part of this area, and it was hoped

The opening of a new field for the production of cotton in the Sudan was of the highest importance. The results of the experiments in growing cotton on the Gezira Plain had proved that a fair yield of good quality Egyptian cotton could be produced there at a time of year when there was no special demand for water in Egypt; for the harvest for cotton in the Sudan synchronized with the sowing of cotton in Egypt. Thus a great future was in store for the Sudan as soon as the irrigation works on the Blue Nile, now being undertaken, were completed, enabling a vast area available for cotton cultivation to be fully developed.
