It was far from desir able that he be there on their return. Yet how should he get away? to snap his bonds by main strength He must have recourse to another

> Britz rolled over on his face. As his hands were tied behind his back his chin rested on the floor, and he had little deverage by which to himself. Several times he tried to rise to his knees, only to slip and bruise his face on the hard floor mishaps were painful, but not dis couraging to a man of Britz's reso luteness. Again and again he made the attempt, again and again he fatled but at last, with a mighty heave tha left him panting, he raised himsel by a catapult movement and sat baon his heels, waiting to catch his method. But what?

It was a harder task to get on hi feet. He could not do it in the middle of the floor. Slowly, carefully, he worked his way on his knees to the wall, against which he braced him self. Then, bit by bit, he bent his feet forward in a demilune until weight was on knees and toes. progress was as painful as it slow, for the silk scarf compelled his ankles to bend in unison, if at all and even when he had bent his toes to the requisite point it was a great strain to keep them there. A whim of fancy, in that moment when he knelt and balanced himself with such extreme difficulty, threw on his mental moving picture screen the memory of little Dorothy March as she looked that afternoon in the Forrest Theater when, unwilling as he was in one way to play upon her girlish ingenuousness, he had deemed it permissible to get from her the information he needed in regard to the drawings from which the fraudulent Missioner neckiace was made. Of course, it was only natural that anycase should come into his mind, it undoubtedly was strange that the picture of the demure débutante should present itself to his inner vision so vividly and so persistently Close behind it came recollection another afternoon on which he had seen little Miss March cantering along the bridle path near the obelish -an afternoon months before he ever heard of the Missioner mystery.

The detective, after a brief pause to gather his strength, set his shoul der against the wall and threw all his force into a single, vigorous pueh. The movement almost threw him t the floor again, but he recovered hi feeling, I get a bot poise quickly and stood erect. For a few moments he was content to revel in the relaxation that was so welcome after his long continuance in a gramped and prostrate position. Then a second's forgetfulness, natural enough to one accustomed to his free. dom of movement, almost undid the work of the last half acur. He tried to step away from the wail, oblivious to the scart that bound his ankles, and pitched forward heavily. He did not fall to the floor, however, for some thing sharp and hard stopped him He found himself wedged between a metallic framework and the wall. venomous hiss and the contact of his should not lose sight of these facts or bound hands with hot metal told him he had fallen on a steam radiator, and as the hissing sound increased he guessed the shock had broken the sands, perhaps millions of women in the the curved pipes. If the detective's position had been perilous before by this famous old remedy, which was was extra hazardous now. He was gripped in the jaws formed by the neither hands nor feet at liberty, it free himself. He kicked and strugggled furiously, the hiss of the steam constantly growing louder, and in his endeavor to escape, he bent forward until his face was scalded by the rushing steam. The pain of that mishap aided him, however, for the in roluntary recoil it caused culminated n a final effort that loosed the grip in which he was held and sent him stagering in a series of two-footed hops

But with doors and windows tightly shut there was a very strong likelihood that if he remained in that room long enough with the steam escaping at its present rate, he would suffocate in the surcharged air-would, in fact, be drowned many stories above the street level. "For some time," Mr. Manson said, were not many lights on that side of the building but a faint gleam in the depths enabled him to judge that he was about at the tenth story, and that the building was in an unfrequented aptown street. Withdrawing his head he pressed the button of a pocket electric torch and explored the room.
