"Long Way To Tipperary"

New English Battle Song

London, Sept. 12 (Special correspondence).—The route to Tipperary, that famous old spot in Ireland, famous for generations in song and story the world over, is of no strategical importance in the great war, but it is playing no mean part these days in upholding what said military experts call the "morale" of the British troops.

"It's a Long Way To Tipperary" has come to be the English battle song in the present war. It will go down in history and it is nothing at all but a London music hall ditty.

As they go into battle the Germans thunder their "Die Wacht am Rhein," the French chant their "Marseillaise," the Americans sing "Yankee Doodle," the Belgians fight gallantly with their beautiful "Brabanconne."

"Tommy Atkins" goes into the fray shouting an inconsequent vaudeville jingle that has in it not a word about death or valor, glory or patriotism.

And so, few Americans know the words of this epoch-making chorus, here they are, fitted for some unfathomed reason to become historic:

It's a long way to Tipperary,
It's a long way to go,
To the sweetest girl I know.
Goodbye, Leicester Square;
It's a long, long way to Tipperary,
But my heart's right there.

The author-composer of this imperishable lyric is Jack Judge, a music hall artist, and there is probably no man in the world more surprised than he at the "far flung" vogue it has so suddenly received.

Mr. Judge, however, who still resides in London, has had time to reflect on the popularity of "Tipperary" and to realize that it is due to the fact that it is a simple, tuneful ditty.

"It's a long way to Tipperary" is a simple ditty, but it has familiarized his French comrades with "Le Chemin à Tipperary," and he sings it when he takes his position in the teeth of a raking shell fire. But why he chooses this particular air nobody knows.
