Her Own Business.

A story illustrating the reticence of the Scotch regarding their private affairs was once told by Ian MacLachlan. A train was at a railroad station, when a porter put his head into a car and called out: "Any one in this car for Down?" "Change for Down?" Any one for Down?" No one moved; and in a few minutes the train was speeding along, not to stop again for nearly an hour. Then an old Scotch woman turned to a lady sitting near her and said, "I'm for Down, but I'd no tell that man so."

William Morton died at St. Olaf, in Hastings county, on Saturday morning, aged seventy-seven years. He had been a member of the township council for thirty years, was a conservative, a Methodist and an Orangeman. A widow, three sons and five daughters survive.
