Marietta Abdicates

"Old maids should be gently chloroformed into another and a better world."
Marietta sniffed and searched for her handkerchief while Dan moved uneasily in his chair.
"I'm mighty sorry you are so opposed to it," he said gently. "Still, I'm not your only brother. George has always said you would be welcome to live with him."
"I'll never live in the same house with George's wife," she dashed. "And Dan, I can't for the life of me understand why you want to marry at all. We have a pleasant home together, you and I. What you see in that little Nora O'Hara passes my comprehension."
Dan smoked in silence. He couldn't put into everyday language his feelings for Nora. It dated far back to the time she was a little girl and lived next door. She used to say she would marry him when she grew up. Now she was battling bravely with adversity he wanted more than anything else in the world to ask her to redeem her promise. But what would become of Marietta was the problem. He cleared his throat. "I suppose it does look foolish and sentimental from your point of view, Marietta. I guess we'd better let the matter drop. I shan't do anything that will make you unhappy." Dan took up a magazine and became absorbed in its pages.
Marietta went on with her crocheting as she brooded over her grievances. Dan would renounce his plans for a wife if she disapproved, and it was right that he should. His salary wasn't enough to support both of them. Moreover, Dan had lived to be 40 and more pretty comfortably without a wife. Nobody ever thought of such a thing as she or Dan getting married. It was never just nor right in Dan to ask her to go out in the world as a wage-earner. Besides, there was nothing she could do. To be sure, she crocheted dollies, but that only brought in a little pin money. If she went to live with George and his domineering wife it would mean giving up the home where she was mistress, her friends, her church, her clubs, and societies—all that constituted her life. Dan was mistaken if he thought it would make him happy to marry a girl like that queer Nora O'Hara.

would, then Marietta herself would keep her. She knew she could make a success of it. She brooded over the problem of how to bring Nora and Dan together with no result. Mrs. Waite said Nora was going to New York on Sunday.
Sunday morning Marietta went to Sunday school, but came home without going to church. As she opened the door she saw Nora standing in the hall. Dan, looking very stern, was evidently saying farewell. "Oh, Miss Marietta," Nora exclaimed. "I just ran over to say good-by to you and Dan. I'm going at 3 o'clock this afternoon."
Marietta glanced from one to the other. "Nora," she said brusquely. "If you think Dan is letting you go without asking you to marry him because I've been opposed to his getting married, I'm going to tell you plainly that you're mistaken."
"Stop right there, Marietta," Dan spoke sharply.
"I won't do it," Marietta answered. "I did make a fuss at first, but I see it differently now. Dan's eyes have given out. He's got to resign and live in the country."
Nora turned white and then red as a rose. Dan fled into the adjoining room. "Then I'll never leave him in the world," Nora cried passionately. "The steamer can call without me. I know the dearest little farm that can be bought for next to nothing. It Dan cares—"
But Marietta had gently pushed her through the opening between the curtains into Dan's outstretched arms. She turned away with a long drawn sigh of relief. Blinking away the tears, she thought, "there seems to be some use for old maids after all."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Seeking Redress For Grievances. Sharbot Lake, Feb. 1.—(To the Editor): May I, through your columns, call the attention of the public to an open letter which, on behalf of the righteous indignation citizens of this township of Oro, I have addressed to the railway commissioners. It is for immediate redress of the wrongs and oppressions visited upon our community at large, and wanton injustices inflicted upon certain innocent faithful employees of the C.P.R. company.
For forty years the township of Oro, not to mention others, has enjoyed that material prosperity which follows the advent of a railway through any section of the country. It was on the tacit understanding these two companies (the K. and P. and C.P.R.) would deal fairly and do justice with the public that the people were led to take up land, build their homes, and plant their acres. For half a century the farmers, contiguous to the line of rail, have brought their produce with a certain hope of finding a market near at hand. Imagine their surprise and dismay, therefore, when they came to Oro one fine morning recently and found the premises closed and an agent dismissed without warning, or provocation of any kind. And now the C.P.R. threatens Clarendon, depriving a section of country twenty-five miles in extent from any means of shipping their produce and thereby earning a living. And why? The reason is, in the C.P.R. acting in this arbitrary and drastic fashion? The only reason that seems to be suggested is that this part of the line does not pay. And what of that? Does that relieve the C.P.R. any the less from supplying this sparsely settled country with the means of transportation. The population is not materially less than when they bought out the charter. The people, moreover, are just as dependent upon the C.P.R. for the means of shipping their produce and buying in their supplies. Does it seem right, therefore, that a community which has been enabled to flourish through the hard-earned profits of the settlers, should now turn round and exploit for larger profits the public who have made them rich?
Another, and what seems to be a still greater injustice than the jud-den closing of these stations, is the peremptory dismissal without notice of a time-honored employee of the K. and P. and C.P.R. This man has served these two companies for thirty-eight years without the breath of a complaint being uttered against him, and he is now dismissed in the dead of winter. Furthermore, he has only one arm, having lost his other while in the faithful discharge of his duties. I ask, could anything be more unjust or inhuman? I especially remembering that, from the moment he lost his arm, he was definitely assured of work with the company. This case becomes still more distressing when we recall the fact that this employee has recently lost his savings with the defunct Farmers' Bank. He has no other means of support. He is now a beggar, and what about the diamond marriage, over which he had charge? Surely it is against the law of any civilized country that any railway company shall have the power to shift the responsibility for the lives of passengers to any brakeman or fireman that happens to come along in case of accident, whose possibility is wonderfully increased, how will the company be able to lodge his blame? and where is the loss after many lives have possibly been lost?

It was certainly a patriotic effort of the C.P.R. to promise to their employees at the front pay for six months, but it's a crying shame that they are now endeavoring to make up for this deficiency, and in order to keep faith with their already overpaid shareholders, are grinding out the lives of their sorry underpaid employees.
Hoping that, for shame's sake, if there is no other motive to right these injustices, that the C.P.R. will endeavor to live more nearly by the golden rule. Thanking you for this policy, I remain, a common citizen, (REV.) H. W. W. BROWWICH.

Care of House Plants.
Plants in dark places require much less water than those placed in full sunlight. If the earth is kept moist, with no sun to dry it, it will become sour, which is fatal. Plants in sun-drenched spots require water each day. The amount of water needed also depends much on the size of the pot. A plant in a small pot may be watered every day, while the same plant in a larger pot would require water only twice a week. A good test is to tap the pot with your knuckles. If dry it will give a hollow sound. Never allow stagnant water to remain in a jardiniere. Plants breathe, so do not allow dust to close up their pores. Never wipe the leaves with an oily cloth, as this only clogs up the pores and makes them harder to clean. Wash the leaves with clear water. Ferns and non-flowering plants will be greatly benefited by placing in the bath tub once or twice a week, with water almost covering the pot, and allowing to remain thus all night.
All flowering plants should be watered as soon as they arrive from the florist. Winter-blooming plants should never be allowed to become dry, as they are very susceptible to droughts and lack of water. When buying flowering plants, select those in bud rather than full bloom. They not only last longer but adapt themselves more quickly to changed surroundings. Flowering plants must have a sunny location until in bloom, then they must be placed in the light without sun.
Latest Fashions in Children's Clothes
Never so tiny a frock do we find these days, nor so diminutive a coat, but that between its ruffles and its frills, its plaits and its braids, we glimpse the latest fashions of the moment. For the clothes of the well-dressed child reflect in every particular the style trend of the season. Simplified, they are, of course, but no less charmingly initiative. For the fashions are pretty. One realizes just how pretty when one sees them in miniature form. How many of their skirts with up extravagances. The full grown with its quality bewitching flare, the new neckline with the turn of the plump rounded shoulder, that hat which grows wider and then drops low over a wee, piquant face, the flower trimmed frock for party wear, the tiny coat with the military note in its braided trimming. Its jaunty front. No extra charge at them. Not over elaborate. Just full of charm, thoroughly becoming.
Twin City Rapid Transit Company for the year ended December 31st, last, showed an increase in surplus of $73,458 after charges of $2,000,000. The following may advise the job while you are deliberating.
