FORTIFICATIONS OF QUEBEC.

Were Citadel Now Stands Was Formerly a Bald Rock.

In his masterly sketch of Quebec and its origin in 1603 Parkman touches on what for the visitor today-fifty years since he wrote-is still the most striking feature of the situation of both Montreal and Quebec; namely, that these cities, one of them at least the very glass of modern progress, seem to stand in a romantic and beautiful setting of primeval forests and rocky uplands. Parkman says:

"Champlain spread his sails, and again held his course up the St. Lawrence. Far to the south, in sun and shadow, slumbered the woody mountains whence fell the countless springs of the St. John, behind tenantless shores, now white with glimmering villages—La Chenaie, Gran-ville, Kamouraska, St. Roche, St. Jean, Vincelot, Berthier. But on the north the jealous wilderness still asserts its sway, crowding to the river's verge its walls, domes and towers of granite; and to this hour its solitude is scarcely broken.

"Above the point of the Island of mile, with the green heights of Point cakes, Levis on one side, and on the other Trial size ....... 10 cents the cliffs of Quebec. Here, a small Regular size ..... 25 cents. stream, the St. Charles, enters the St. Lawrence, and in the angle betwixt them rises the promontory, on two sides a natural fortress. Between the cliffs and the river lay a light strand covered with walnuts and other trees. From this strand, by rough passage gullied downward now (1865) guards the way, one p.m. might climb the heights to the broken plateau above, now burdened with its ponderous load of churches convents, dwellings, ramparts, and batteries. Thence by a gradual ascent, the rock sloped upward to its highest summit, Cape Diamond, looking down on the St. Lawrence from a height of three hundred and fifty feet. Here the citadel now stands; then the sun fell on the bald rock, decked here and there with mosses and lichens. Two centuries and a half have quickened the soli-tude with swarming life, covered the deep bosom of the river with barge and steamer and gliding sail, and reared cities and villages on the site of forests; but nothing can destroy the surpassing grandeur of the

The Colonel and the Recruit. A prominent business man of King street west, Toronto, tells how the financial stringency has unavoidably urged curtailments in several departments in his factory. He even had to call in certain men and explain how they must be laid off until times got better. One-a big, husky hand, whose skill in his line was such that he did not want to lose him-was offered other work at slightly reduced money if he would stay till business got better again. The business man is also a colonel on the retired list. He had been summoned by the Militia Department to report at Valcartier to assist in the preparations for receiving the first contingent. He was to leave that night, but he made time to have a regular heart-to-heart talk with the valued employe referred to. But "Swe he says that pretty near all his pri-wate business worries were forgotten poodle." in the turmoil of the bustling job at Valcartier. The troop trains kept pouring into camp from all over Canada, and invariably just before all their efforts could manage to perfect reception arrangements. "I remember that we had a breathing-spell just before the 48th Highlanders arrived, and with several other officers I was awaiting Col. Currie's appearance on the scene. The pipers had passed us on the swing, and the brave boys in kilts themselves, and we officers were moving to headquarters again, when to my astonishment (and that of the staff with me)
I beard: "Hello, Mr. —, how's things?' Perched aloft on top of a supply wagon there was my big, jolly, husky chap from Toronto that I had been so anythers to be a supply as a property of Minnesota, Minnehaha.

I had been so anythers to be a supply wagon to be a supply wago I had been so anxious to keep on.
I thought I should sink through the huckleberry bushes. "Hello, Mr.

" it sounded so familiar a A little nonsense, now and then, greeting, and yet so unfamiliar is relished by the best of men: down here in the shadow of the war But seen too oft, they take offence.
