Get up, Miss Dorothy," said nurse is half-past seven.

"All right, nurse," replied Dorothy, in a sleepy tone; but, instead of getting up, she turned over on her side and went off to sleep again, Nurse bustled around getting Dorothy's bath ready, and presently "Get up, Dorothy." said a voice once

It did not sound like nurse's voice or mother's, so Dorothy sat up and looked around. She saw a little old man, about as tall as herself standing by the side of the bed. "Who are you?" she asked.

"I am King Neptune and I have come to take you to my kingdom under the sea," was the answer. Dorothy jumped up quickly, and the next moment found that she was walking down the garden path, with the little old man beside her. She did not remember how she got there, but nevertheless she trotted along by his side and he led her straight to at the bottom of the garden. There was a little boat fastened there, so they both stepped in. Presently Dorothy saw that everythingthe little old man, the boat, the brook; in fact, everything-except herself-was growing larger. Then after floating down the river silently (for the brook was now the size of a river), they came to a large whirl-
