go right to the front if given a chance," said Major Williams. "This girl has three brothers on the firing line, but all she has been able to do is to knit socks, and collect money to buy comforts for the soldiers."

"Why this is what my grandmother can do," said the girl. "I would like to get something harder to do. I don't see why there is not more work for a girl to do. When my brothers come home from the war and they ask me what I did to help win the war, I will feel ashamed of myself."

"If my brothers should ask me what I did all I would be able to tell them is that I collected money and knitted socks, while they will have great stories to tell about what they did. I think that there should be far more important work that I could do."

Major Williams, speaking about recruiting in the rural districts, declared that there was great need for education. He told about being almost chased off one farm by an angry farmer who said, "stay away from here; I do not want you to steal all my boys, as I need them on the farm."

Then the war was fully explained to the farmer. When he was told that if sufficient men were not secured to keep up the fight, that Canada would be invaded and that his farm and all he held dear would suffer, he soon changed his mind and was ready to allow his boys to go to the front.

TRAINING BLIND SOLDIERS.

Toronto World Makes Reference to Lieut. E. A. Baker.

In an editorial on "Training Blind Soldiers," the Toronto World has a reference to Lieut. E. A. Baker, of Collins Bay, a graduate of Queen's University, who lost the sight of both his eyes during his "bit" at the front. In the editorial appearing the following:

"An example of what can be done has been adduced in Lieut. E. A. Baker, who received the military cross for bravery, but unfortunately lost his sight entirely. He was a graduate in electricity, and is now being given a special course so that he can resume his former work. He has learned to read and write according to the blind methods in three months. He has also acquired what is a sixth sense in the blind, in the ability to detect the proximity of objects. Others have succeeded in legal work, in medicine, in journalism, and in some commercial pursuits. Many are able to take up music either artistically or mechanically, as in tuning."

Travelling Men, Attention! When you are through with this paper on the train throw it out to the first gang of section men you pass, so they can read and enjoy it. They will appreciate it.
