WAS IN A ZEPPELIN RAID

R. W. HEPBURN HAD A THRILLING EXPERIENCE.

Bomb Dropped Near Where He Was
—Kingston Engineer Was Engaged in Coasting Trade Between Great Britain and France.

R. W. Hepburn, engineer on the Tagona, of the Canadian Steamship Lines, now engaged in the coasting trade between Great Britain and France, who arrived home recently, passed through a thrilling experience at Dunkirk, France, when Zeppelins, accompanied by aeroplanes, made thirteen raids on the place in forty-eight hours.

Mr. Hepburn told the Whig that bombs fell only a few yards from the Tagona, and that much damage was done from the docks and about the city. In the raids, which occurred in the latter part of May, nine men were killed and twenty-two wounded, and the Zeppelins and aeroplanes flew very high, and the land guns, though they tried very hard to get them, were unsuccessful. There were thirteen Zeppelins in the raid, and as many more aeroplanes.

Mr. Hepburn says that no attempt was made to submarine the Tagona, and this was undoubtedly due to the great precautions taken. Once, when the Tagona was on its way to Dunkirk, a vessel preceding it about five miles was torpedoed and sank almost immediately. The captain of the Tagona at once turned his vessel around and ran back for three hours. Had he continued on his way the Tagona would also likely have fallen a victim to the submarine which had sunk the other boat.

The Tagona, which was formerly a lake boat, after going overseas used to run from Middleboro, on the north-east coast of England, to Nancy, in France, and Bilbao, in Spain. From Bilbao it brought back to Middleboro hematite ore, which is used in manufacturing armour plate for ships. After the Empress of Fort William, a sister ship, was lost, the Tagona ran from Leith and Glasgow to Dunkirk, which is only thirty miles from the firing line.

Mr. Hepburn states that the Canadian Steamship Lines has lost five vessels by submarines and mines: The Midland Queen, the Donnacona, the Empress of Midland, the Empress of Fort William, and the Dunelm.

Mr. Hepburn has been overseas for several months, and was called home by illness in the family. He does not expect to go back again. Mr. Hepburn resides at No. 10 Pine street.
