The Heroical Vein.

"The heroical vein of mankind runs much in the soldiery, and courageous part of the world; and in that of that tribe; and when we read their notable acts, we easily find what a friendship, and fidelity may be to burn for their country and their choice of a covetous man for a narrow and poltron friendship. Pitiful things are only to be found in the cottages of such breasts; but bright thoughts, clear deeds, constancy, fidelity, bounty, and generous honesty, are the gems of noble minds; wherein, to derogate from none, the true heroic English gentlekilled. Aemilius speaks of six senatours of Calais, that came with halters in their hands to the King of England, to dye for the rest. This love makes so many writers take such pains, so many historiographers, physicians, etc., or at least as they pretend, for common safety, and their countrey's benefit." - Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy."

They Found a Mine.

An exciting time was experienced a few days ago by the crew of the steamer Clermiston, when nearing Leith. A mine was sighted floating right in the track of the vessel. A boat was lowered from the steamer and a rope made fast to the mine in order that it might be towed to the nearest patrol boat. . There was a choppy sea, so that the work of getting the ropes around the mine was of a hazardous character. The men succeeded, however, in securing it, but after towing for a quarter of an hour the mine blew up, sending smoke and water to a great height, and fragments of the mine fell aboard the steamer.

One of those things not generally known is that the wearing of spats originated as a compliment to the kilted regiments who wore them in the Indian Mutiny. The glorious deeds of the Highlanders in that campaign made them popular heroes, and the public adopted many things in dress in imitation of Scotch uniforms. Among these, things were epats, and they have never been out of fashion among smart people since the days of Sir Colin Campbell .-London Chronicle.

George M. Barnes, president of the Central City Trust Co., Syracuse, N.Y., died on Saturday at his summer home, Round Island, from chronic nephritis. He had been in poor health for a year.
