PREFERS OBEYING ORIGINAL ORDER. Thomas Reilly, Liberated From Prison in Mistake, Hesitates To Return.

Another chapter in the chequered history of Thomas Reilly, late of Portsmouth penitentiary, present place of residence uncertain, has been written. It will be remembered that Reilly, who was a southerner by birth, and had taken occasion to express his lack of affection for the colored race by attacking a negro at London, Ont., with a bottle of beer, acting as a bartender, was released from penitentiary in mistake for another man of the same name.

The other Thomas Reilly had served a considerable portion of his sentence, and an order was issued for his parole. As a result of confusion in the identity the wrong Thomas Reilly was led across the American border and there released, a free man.

When the mistake was discovered extradition proceedings were commenced, but there was considerable difficulty in locating Reilly, as he seemed to have the general sympathy of his new neighbors. However, Reilly later wrote to W. P. Archibald, Dominion Parole Officer, asking what he was to do. The reply was that he had better give himself up and trust to the mercy of the Canadian justice authorities.

The latest development is a naive answer from Reilly to the effect that as he was led across the border by the Dominion police when released, and told to stay there, he regards it as an inexcusable violation of this mandate to come back.

As the Justice Department has been unable to think of anything to say in answer to this argument, nothing has been said.

Operating a 160-horse-power Curtiss biplane, Victor Carlstrom on Tuesday afternoon flew from Buffalo to Hammondsport, N.Y., a distance of 100 miles, in an hour and four minutes.
