Big Guns and Flaming Oil Do Their Bit on East and West Fronts

Giant British gun firing at night on the Somme front. So accurate is the range that these big guns score practically every hour of the the Empire Club, these guns have silenced batteries and destroyed trenches miles away.

During the days of the Roumanian campaign when the Toronto forces were sweeping everything aside in their advance an oil well was uncapped and tanks opened by Roumanians. Flaming oil formed an impassable barrier.

This is from an intimate photograph taken by a staff artist with the British troops on the Macedonia front. Loading and aiming a trench bomb.

The motor from an old automobile has been used to good advantage by a British soldier. It is the propelling force for a light locomotive used behind the lines on the western front.

An outdoor chapel in England where prayers are said for those fighting at the front.
