For all Complexion Ills

If the skin be colorless, sallow, muddy, over-red, blotchy, chapped or freckled, nothing will so surely overcome the condition as ordinary mercurochrome. It liberally takes off a bad complexion—absorbs the dead and near-dead particles of surface skin, gently, gradually causing no inconvenience at all. A new complexion is then in evidence, clear, spotless, delicately soft and beautiful. One ounce of this wax, procurable at any drugstore, will rejuvenate even the worst complexion. It is used like cold cream.

THE CONFESSIONS OF ROXANE

(By Frances Walter)

I ENTERTAIN MORE DOUBTS AND DARKER FEARS

(Copyright, 1916, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate)

While my personal affairs were engrossing my attention Arthur and Evelyn seemed to be growing constantly closer together. Several times I thought I would bring up the subject, but each time that it was on the tip of my tongue I decided that then was not a propitious moment to discuss the matter. I had endeavored to read Arthur's mind. Supplementing this womanly investigation with feminine observation, I tried to arrive at a definite conclusion as to Arthur's attitude toward the young girl, but I met with but slight success. Since Arthur had become a man of affairs he had acquired that faculty so often noticed among business men of concealing his real feeling about things which concerned him vitally. Anyone who has attempted to practice mind reading upon a "big business" executive can appreciate what I mean. There is a manly reserve about him which will defy all effort at penetration.

So it was with Arthur. In the old days it was an easy matter for me to tell what he was thinking about or how he felt concerning any particular matter in which we were mutually interested. It had been possible even for me to know when he was attempting to mislead me in an expression of opinion. But now this was changed. Arthur went about his affairs with a calm, impersonal air which clung to him like a garment. I could no more tell what he really thought of Evelyn Phillips than I could infer what he thought of the stock market. All my information as to their relations was confined to what I had been able to gather from Evelyn's actions. This had convinced me that she was deeply attached to Arthur, but beyond that I was baffled. I could not decide whether she loved him because of himself merely or if she had based her affections upon the position and money which Arthur could control. There was a feverish manner about her whenever she was with him which suggested that all was not well between them. Whether it was because she feared Arthur might not care for her, or had told her he did not, or if it was the result of anxiety over the possible outcome of their friendship, was something which I was unable to determine to my satisfaction. But I was convinced of one thing—that she loved him. Whether it was a selfish, material love or one which could rise above mercenary considerations was indeterminate.

To say that these suspicions and doubts harassed me is to put it very lightly. It is not a very agreeable thing, and certainly it is not conducive to one's composure, to know that one's husband admires another woman to such an extent that one's domestic welfare is endangered. But I do not think I permitted my worries to affect my manner either toward Arthur or Evelyn. I do not believe Evelyn suspected for one moment that I was watching her closely, and the idea that I was keeping Arthur under strict scrutiny never I am convinced, crossed his mind. Nor did I allow my troubles to affect my friendship for others in my little circle of acquaintances. We continued to give our little dinner parties and our dances and card playing affairs, and periodically we were Mr. Henderson's guests at the more stately functions which he gave for our benefit.

Nor did any of the entanglements which enmeshed him hinder his work. He forged steadily ahead, developing the A. B. C. Company's business to an extent which neither he nor Mr. Henderson had thought possible. One of the immediate results of this success was to establish him more firmly in Mr. Henderson's confidence and to give him a reputation throughout the city as a successful manufacturer. Indeed he was pointed out as an example for other young men to follow. The newspapers published long articles in their Sunday magazine supplements in which he was pictured as a young Napoleon of business, and the financial papers quoted him frequently on trade and market conditions.

Sometimes I thought it was the glitter of fame which had captivated Evelyn and which, unless something stayed her, I suspected might lead to serious consequences. I knew her impetuous nature and I feared that she might stop at nothing to accomplish any purpose which she had set before her. I had not talked to her father for some time, but I was confident he knew no more than he had when he last spoke to me about her, for she was not one into her secrets, particularly when the secret was one which would reflect no credit either upon her personally or upon the family name. I determined that I would, nevertheless, have another heart to heart talk with the old man. Perhaps he had learned something which he had tried to keep from me because of its seriousness.

Before I had an opportunity to do this something happened which threatened to change the whole course of my life. (To Be Continued.)

First Favorites in Neckwear.

New collar designs featuring the tailored effects so much in vogue. Lace is daintily used, however, as shown on the collar with cuffs to match.

Here are some of the most favored designs in neckwear to wear with the separate blouse. The well-dressed woman no doubt has noticed that the majority of new offerings feature tailored effects with simple touches of hand embroidery or lace on them. Five different styles of collars are shown here, while an extra design includes cuffs to match. The material required for the various collars is as follows: No. 1, one-half yard; No. 2, three-eighths yard; No. 3, 5, five-eighths yard each; No. 4, one yard; No. 5, five-eighths yard, with 14 yards of edging. In all instances the material must be 36 inches wide.

The construction guide illustrates very plainly how each collar should be made. The first requires only to have the neck edge finished with a narrow band. This is also true of collar No. 3. To make the second model, join the two sections as notched, center-backs even and stitch on outside of collar, 1/4 inch from seam. Turn the upper part of collar underneath on line of small "o" perforations.

Death of David Mair. Lanark, Dec. 12.—Following a week's illness with pneumonia, David Mair passed this life on 4th inst., at the Victoria House. Advanced years told against him in combating the trouble. He was seventy-six years of age and at this time of life in a somewhat weakened physical condition, he was unable to put up a strong resistance to the disease. David Mair was a well known figure in Lanark life for many years. His father was the late John Mair, at one time an enterprising business man of the village. He was the man who established the tanning industry here at a time when a heavy demand for local work of this kind gave importance to the trade. He acquired two acres of land, built a large tannery by the river side and the building still stands, and is now owned by Robert White, where the main tannery industry once flourished. David worked with his father and became familiar with all the details pertaining to the trade. In these days lumbering on a large scale caught the attention of the district and David drifted to the woods with the gangs that passed through Lanark every fall on their way up the river. For years he followed shanty and river life and became skilled in both branches of woodcraft. Among the river men he was looked upon in the heyday of his youth as one of the most sure-footed and intrepid.
