A WONDERFUL YEAR!

To the Policy-holding Owners of The Prudential Insurance Company of America:

During 1916 your Company issued OVER FIVE HUNDRED AND NINETY-ONE AND ONE-HALF MILLION DOLLARS of paid-for life insurance at the lowest expense-rate in your Company's history. This is the largest year's business ever paid for by The Prudential. The gain in insurance in force was $283,000,000.

Although your Company is but forty-one years old, you are now the holders of 15,000,000 policies, representing a total insurance in force of OVER THREE BILLION DOLLARS.

Since your Company was organized it has paid to its policyholders the great sum of $428,000,000, including more than $28,750,000 not called for in any way by the policy contracts. The 1916 payments to policyholders were over $47,278,000.

This wonderful growth and these remarkable figures reflect anew the confidence the insuring public has in The Prudential, and are a reinforcement of its aims, its achievements and its service.

A PERILOUS JOURNEY.

British Unit of Armored Cars Joins Russians.

One of the most striking features of the war is the manner in which the forces of the various belligerents are mixed up with one another. On the western front, for instance, Russians are fighting with French and British, including Colonials and Indian troops, against the Germans.

On the Italian front, Italians, assisted to a certain extent by British Red Cross detachments, are struggling with Austrians, Germans, and Hungarians. North of Salonica, British, French, Montenegrins, Serbians, Russians, and Italians, assisted by Greeks, are matched against the Bulgarian Germans, while on the Russian front, English units are to be found fighting with the Russians against the Turks. The Russians, in company with Roumanians, are also opposed to Bulgarians, Turks, Germans, and Austrians.

Where several of the British units mentioned in a detachment of armored cars. This small force is with the Grand Duke's army in Armenia. Particulars of how this detachment reached its destination, like the journey of the Russians to Marselles, when the story comes to be told, will make interesting reading. The unit was organized and is commanded by Commander Oliver Locker-Lampson, M.P., and included officers and men from the distant dominions as well as from England. The expedition journeyed from England to Russia by the White Sea and was forced to spend the winter in the Arctic. In the spring, however, the men were able to land all their guns, cars, and equipment, receiving a great ovation on their arrival at their destination.

After a short stay in Petrograd, the members of the detachment were decorated by the Czar. The unit crossed the Caucasian Mountains and went into action against the Turks. Correspondence from members of the party show that the unit underwent ceaseless training in the Arctic. They also did valuable salvage work, and the credit of saving one ship with a cargo worth $250,000 was in no small measure due to their efforts.

While on the Kola peninsula the unit also carried out important work in guarding German prisoners and in transporting material for the Russian overland by sleighs. Another party was occupied for a couple of months in assisting the Russians to complete a section of the new railway connecting Kola with Petrograd. Towards the end of their sojourn in the Arctic, firewood ran out and all had to subsist on black bread and biscuits. At the end of May preparations were made for the departure of the unit from the Kola peninsula, and eventually the force reached Archangel. During the embarkation operations at Alexandrovsk a boat containing the party broke up and had to be abandoned, its occupants having to camp. Some of the party were exposed for 24 hours until rescued by a British trawler.

From Archangel the squadrons proceeded in a train of 47 carriages on their long journey to Vladikavkaz, meeting everywhere with an unprecedented welcome. On the arrival of the force at Vladikavkaz the Grand Duke sent a telegram of welcome which said: "With my whole heart I welcome the arrival of the armored car detachment from England, the great ally of our glorious armies. As the Hetman in command of the Cossack armies of the Caucasus I greet them."

Battlefield Memorials.
In a graveyard west of Vimy, in France, there are buried 1,320 French soldiers and more than 600 English, says The London Times. The earth is bare on most of the English graves; the French ones are older, but all are cared for alike by the Englishman now in charge of the place. "We leave you our trenches and our dead," a French officer said to an English one when our army took over this part of the line, and both parts of the trust are discharged with a will. What this means for the French one feels when one sees the visits of French soldiers' friends to their graves. The other day a French woman in deep mourning came here with a handful of flowers to place upon one of these. One of the usual little bareheaded processions came into the cemetery—an a.c.o. showing the way; then an English chaplain; then, on a stretcher, the body, a big Union Jack lying over it; then half a dozen privates. The French woman rose and fell in at the rear of the procession, with some of the flowers still in her hand. When the service was over she came close to the grave and dropped the white flowers in. One felt the truth of Sir Douglas Haig's saying that a kind of work which "does not directly contribute to the successful termination of the war" may still "have an extraordinary moral value to the troops in the field, as well as to the relatives and friends of the dead at home."

Bars and Bars.
A grimy-looking stranger wandered into a certain seaside cafe the other day. He looked about him in an inquiring way for a second or two, and then, turning to the waitress, said, rather sharply:

"I say, miss, where's the bar?"

"What kind of a bar?" queried the waitress in return, and as icily as she could:

"Why! A liquor bar, of course!" he drawled. "What sort of a bar did you suppose I meant?"

"Well," she said, and her eyebrows arched slightly. "I didn't know, but I thought perhaps you might mean a bar of soap."

Art of Conversation.
The art of conversation was not always possessed by literary men. Coleridge and Macaulay were said to absorb so much time on an interesting subject that they were generally regarded as bores, whereas Robert Browning, with all his cumbersome poetry, was fascinating in his talk.

Losses of nearly a million dollars during 1916 were reported at the annual meeting of the stockholders and directors of the Agricultural Insurance Company at Watertown, N. Y.
