WHEN THE "ORLEANS" REACHED BORDEAUX

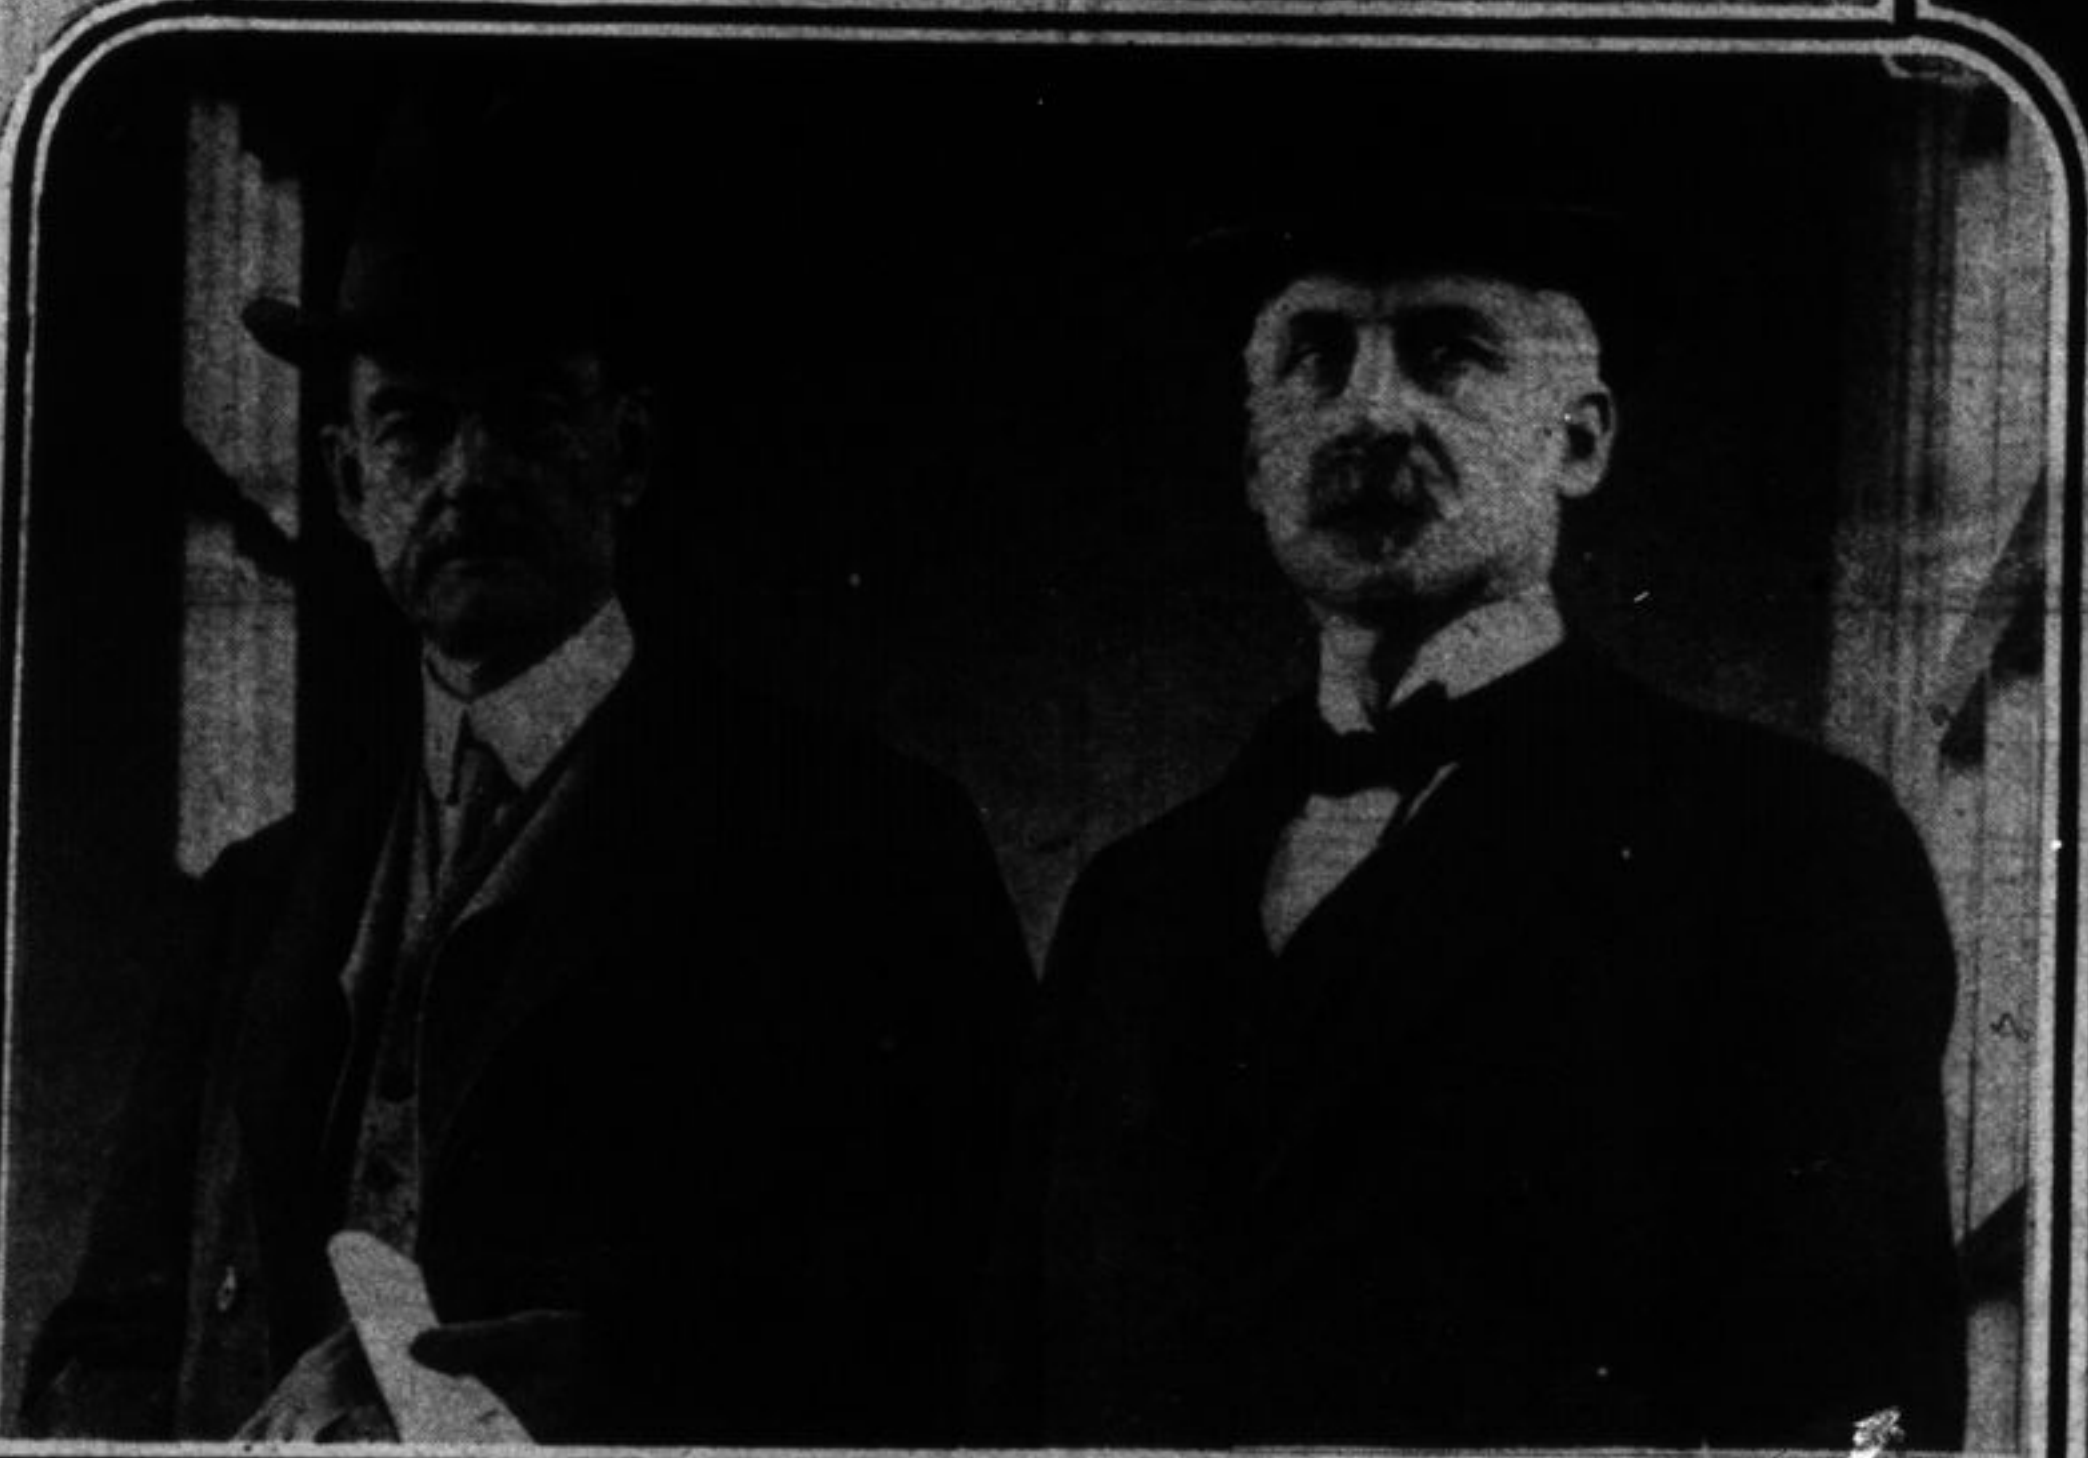

When the German Government announced the now famous U-boat decree last February it seemed for a time that it would completely paralyze American shipping. However, two ships, the "Rochester" and the "Orleans," both of the American line, weighed anchor and departed for French ports. Both arrived safely and our picture shows the "Orleans" docking at Bordeaux. A huge crowd assembled there to welcome the crew.

Capt. Allan Tucker, of the "Orleans," was a popular hero in Bordeaux when he arrived there after bringing his ship safely through the danger zone and by his contempt of German "frightfulness." He is here seen, accompanied by several French officials, carrying a bouquet of flowers. (Above.)
Miss Isabel Silver, aged eighteen, who has volunteered for duty with the Emsworth Fire Brigade, England, owing to the shortage of men. Photo shows her carrying the hose. (To left.)

An observation automobile for the U.S. army. The tower extends 25 feet in the air, and when the car is travelling can be folded back. It is equipped for using a machine gun on the top, and is also adapted for sending wireless messages.

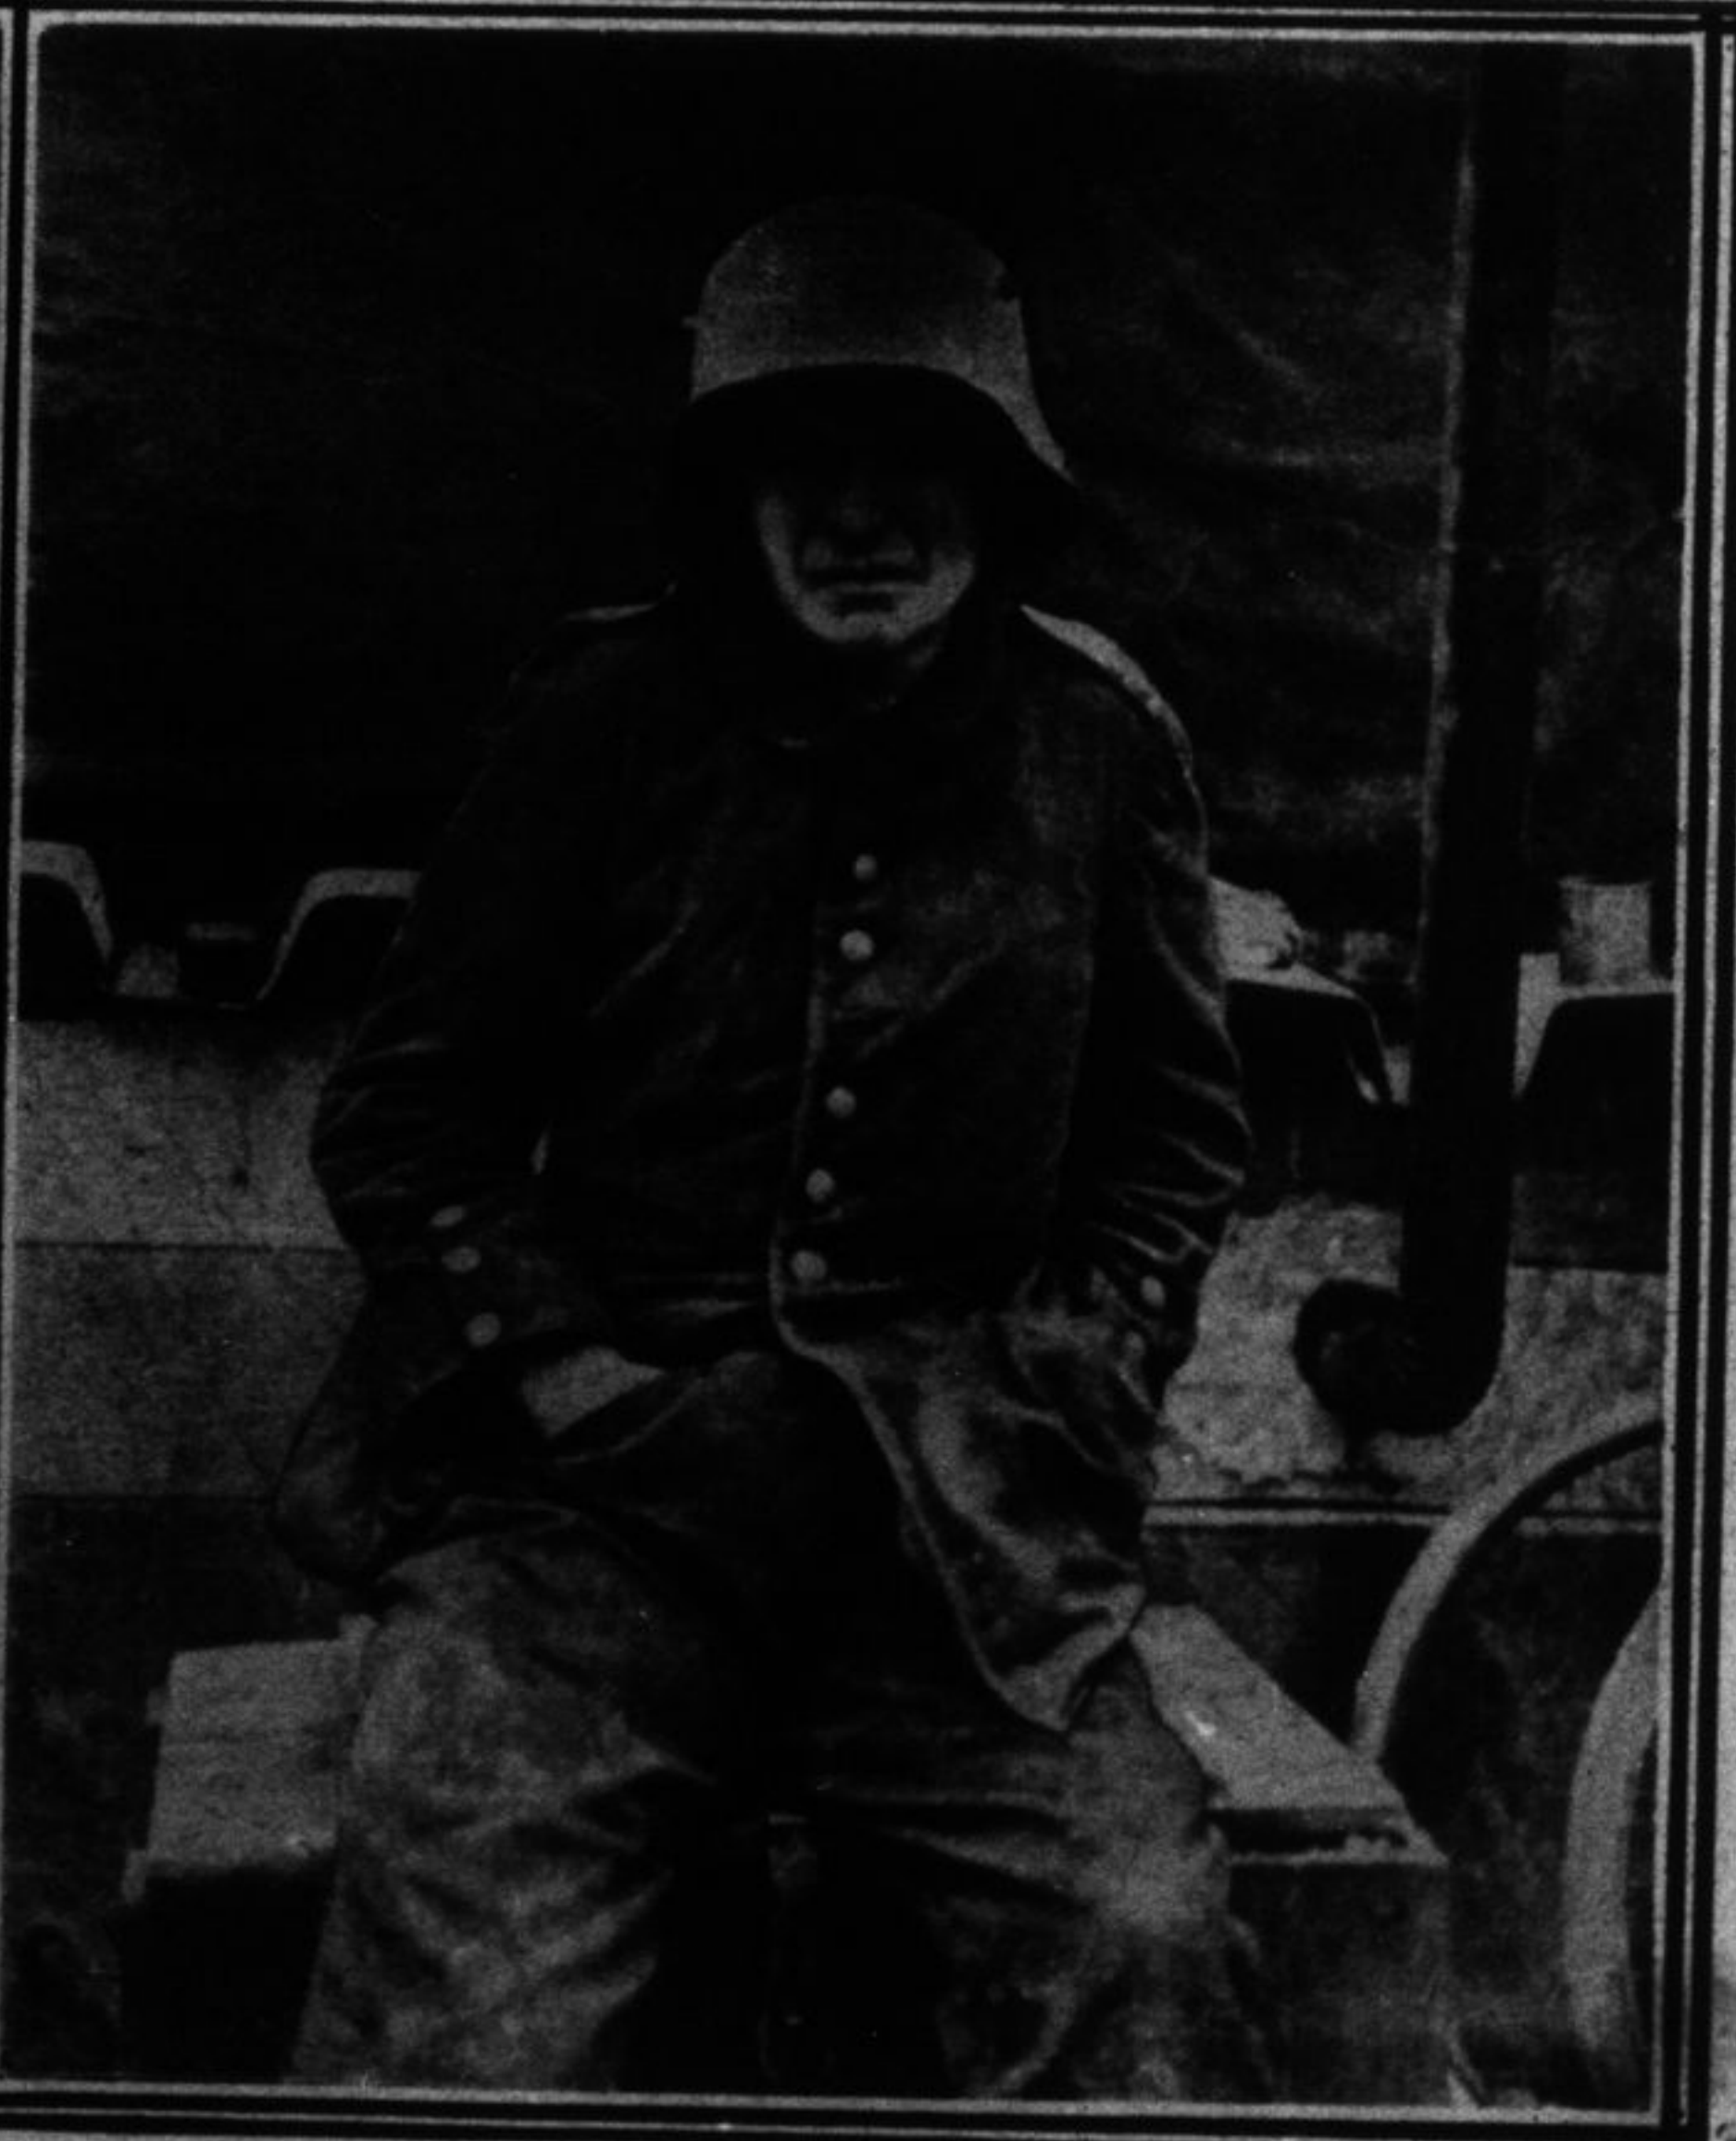

Sir Herbert Ames, M.P., and Commodore Amelius Jarvis, visiting New York and Washington, telling how Canada raised her Patriotic Fund, and explaining our preparedness measures. They are guests of the navy league and will confer with Washington Officials.

Miss Loretta Walsh, of Philadelphia, first woman to enlist in U. S. navy. She was given rating of Chief Yeoman, and began her duties by enrolling men in the Coast Defence Reserve and doing clerical work.

Greek artillery taking up a position at the side of a cup-like hollow among the mountains. This view is entirely typical of scenes now taking place in Greece. The hills are covered with tufts of scrub, but are bare of trees. The hills rise very suddenly, and the operations of one district are screened from another.

A German prisoner taken in a recent battle. He appeared to be quite content with his fate and showed no hard feelings or bitterness towards his captors.
