At the commencement of the war every member of Canada's permanent force volunteered for service and the majority of the noncommissioned men went overseas. These men have ow received commissions, and are in many cases high up in the service now, while their less fortunate comrades, whose services were considered more valuable at home, have been left behind in the promotion lists, but have been training the hundreds of housands of officers and men now in the expeditionary forces.

When war broke out there were very few trained soldiers in Canada who were capable of carrying out the schemes of the military authorities to raise large armies, and it is stated the majority of the men not aken forward have been unable to get any leave since the war started and have been steadily working to perfect the great military organization of the Dominion.
