THE CONFESSIONS OF ROXANE

(By Frances Walter)

I FACE EDWARD
(Copyright, 1916, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
After we entered the taxicab I explained that Sylvia and I were friends, and suggested that he order the chauffeur to drive to my apartment, where Sylvia was making her home. After this was arranged there were few words spoken. Edward's face, which had reflected only happiness a few moments before, now became pale and drawn, while that of his companion was still white with anger. Indeed, the elderly man refused even to look at any of the three of us, and kept his face turned toward the window of the rapidly moving vehicle.
Sylvia, who now was feeling the reaction from her excitement of a short time before, sat huddled back in her seat, casting frightened glances first at Edward, then at me, and finally at the elderly man. As for myself, I understood what the paragrapher meant that time when he said that silence was golden, and I kept as quiet as a mouse.
When the car stopped in front of the apartment, Edward had almost to lift Sylvia to the curb, and when he saw that she could hardly stand, he put his arm about her waist and held her close to him. The elderly man made no move to leave the car.
"Well," said Edward presently, "will you not get out?"
The man jerked himself bolt upright and cast a fiery glance at the youth.
"No!" he shouted. "I shall take no further part in this disgraceful affair! Go ahead; go your own way! I am through with you!"
"Very well," declared Edward, his voice becoming hard. "Have your own way about it."
He turned and was leading Sylvia toward the entrance when the elderly man changed his mind and bounded from the car.
"But, by jove, I will!" he cried. "I will see this thing through!"
And before we knew it he strode past us and led the way into the house.
"Now," he demanded, standing in the middle of my sitting room, his hat still on his head and his feet planted firmly upon my best carpet. "Now, what have you to say for yourself?"
"Nothing—yet," returned Edward defiantly. "I want this young woman to be comfortable, and this young woman," turning to me, "to accept my apologies before we go any further."

"Apologies are not necessary," I hastened to assure him, "but I agree with you that Miss Thorne should be made comfortable, as you suggest. If you will wait a moment I will see that she is."
I led poor, frightened Sylvia away, while the two men glared at each other. I was determined that she should not hear the explanations which the elderly man would demand, and when we had entered my bedroom I closed the door and motioned Sylvia to sit down.
"What does it all mean, Roxane?" she asked faintly, as she sank upon a couch.
"I do not know, Sylvia," I replied, "but I believe you can rely upon Edward. There was no mistaking the evidence which he displayed when he met you. And I smiled in spite of my agitation."
"But who is the other man?" Sylvia went on. "I do not understand it."
"Neither do I," I replied, "but we shall understand it in a few minutes. Let us give Edward and his companion a chance to say what they want to say, and then Edward will be free to tell you everything you want to know."
I sat down beside her and took her hand.
"Be patient a little while longer," I urged.
The murmur of voices came to us, but we could distinguish nothing that was said, although that of the older man at times was raised to a high pitch. Edward, apparently, was keeping his temper on, being the one upon whom the necessity of explanation lay he was not moved by any such emotion as anger.
After what seemed nearly an hour the voices ceased and we heard a door slam.
"Wait until I return," I told Sylvia, and hurried out, fearful that Edward too, might have departed. But he had not. I found him in the sitting room beside the window, staring out at the house-tops. When he heard me he turned quickly and advanced toward me.
"Where is she?" he demanded.
I faced him bravely, nerved by a sense of duty and of responsibility for the girl, whose life I had saved and for whom I had cared with the devotion of an older sister.
"She is here," I told him, "but before you see her again I, as her only friend and counselor, must have a word with you."
He looked doubtfully at me for a moment and then yielded.
"Certainly," he said.

An Agreeable Addition to the Summer Wardrobe.

A pleasing design for development in the soft, silky materials for summer wear. The dress is trimmed with buttons, applied on the front, pockets and fancy sleeves.
A frock made after this model, would be a very agreeable addition to the summer wardrobe. It may be fashioned of satin, crepe de chine or crepe metzger. The back of the waist and back gore of the skirt are cut in one, the remaining parts of the skirt being gathered to a high waistband. The waist front extends below the waistline at the sides, forming pockets. In medium size the design requires 5 1/2 yards 36-inch material, with 3/4 yard 2-inch belting for stay and 1/2 yard extra material 36-inches wide for the girle.
To properly begin the construction of the dress, adjust the pocket section underneath the curved edge of front gore, and under the tab extension matching single and double notches; stitch to position around the notched edges leaving edge of pocket section having 3 and 4 notches free.
Pictorial Review Costume No. 6953.

bring single large and double small "o" perforations in front to corresponding perforation in stay.
Now gather upper edge of front gore from the tab extension to center-front and stitch to position over the lower edge of waist, front edges even, stitch upper edge of front gore at under-arm seams, over gathers. Lap right front gore on left, center-fronts even and stitch to position leaving edges free from single large "o" perforation to lower edge; finish edges above for closing.
To make the girle, plait, creating on lines of slot perforations, and bring folded edges to corresponding lines of small "o" perforations, then press. Adjust to position slipping underneath tab extensions and close under the left tab. Face the collars and sew to neck edge, notches and center-backs even.
Next, close sleeve seams as notched, leaving seam having double notches free below small "o" perforation. Sew in armhole as notched, small "o" perforation at shoulder seam, easing in any fullness.
Trim with buttons of the same or contrasting color.
Sizes, 14 to 20 years. Price, 29 cents.

THE PHYSICAL WELFARE

OF THE PEOPLE OF CANADA IS VERY IMPORTANT.
Dr. Michael Steele of South Perth Urges That Special Department of the Government Deal With It.
Ottawa, May 2.—In the House of Commons yesterday afternoon, Dr. Michael Steele, South Perth, moved that a special department of the Government having supervision over all matters relating to the physical welfare of the people of the Dominion should be organized. Dr. Steele, speaking in support of his resolution, advanced some powerful arguments as to why the resolution should receive careful consideration from the House. He said that the war had furnished some remarkable examples of sanitation and medical science. In stead of thousands of soldiers dying of typhoid and tens of thousands being rendered useless through the same disease, as had occurred in all previous wars, medical science had practically eliminated typhoid. Not only had typhoid been conquered, but also cholera and tetanus.

Dr. Steele argued that if disease could be conquered in war surely it could also be overcome in times of peace. One method which the government might employ to combat the spread of disease was by controlling immigration so that no unfit person should be allowed to enter the Dominion. He gave figures showing how the number of feeble-minded persons in Canada was rapidly increasing, and said that out of ten hundreds of examining immigrants, many mentally deficient people doubtless found their way past the immigration officers into the country. Eighty per cent of the offspring of such persons would, said the doctor, also be feeble-minded. The problem of mental deficiency was intimately associated with crime, poverty, disease, immorality and other social evils.
The most appalling feature of the whole subject, said Dr. Steele, was the vast national loss resulting from infant mortality. There were dying in Canada every year about thirty thousand children under one year of age, and fifteen thousand of these lives could be saved. In view of the tremendous loss of lives due to the war, it was of tremendous importance to preserve the child life of the country. During the past fifty years, we had paid less attention to the health of our children than we had to that of the horse, the cow or the hog. Every European country, he said, had its National Health Service, and the United States, in 1913, had established a Federal Public Health Service. Dr. Steele closed by asking the House to give his resolution favorable consideration. The debate on Dr. Steele's motion was adjourned after a brief discussion by the House.

Convalescent Soldiers at Frank, Alberta Military Hospital Have Book.
"Frankness from Frank" is the title of a splendid little semi-monthly which is being published by the disabled soldiers in the Frank, Alberta Military Hospital. A copy given to the Whig by a Kingstonian, contains an article under the heading, "Ram in the Trenches." The article is lengthy, dealing in detail with the practical value of ram to the boys who have to stand hours and hours in ice cold water or endure many other hardships equally as great.
"There are a few, but a mighty few, who do not take the ram when it is issued. They admit it would do them good, but refuse for principle's sake. Yet ninety per cent. of these same principled creatures will not bat an eyelash when they draw this ram ration and hand it to some booze-soaked toper who has made arrangements with them to do so." The article's concluding paragraph reads: "We hold no brief for the liquor traffic in this country, rather
