THE CONFESSIONS OF ROXANE

(By Frances Walter)

I AGAIN FACE MRS. BLAKE.

(Copyright, 1916, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

Edward drove the detective and me within a few blocks of Mrs. Blake's home and, obeying instructions from the cautious Mr. Flynn, put him down first and then carried me a short distance farther on before letting me out. When I reached the sidewalk I looked around, expecting to see the detective near by, but he was not in sight, and with a feeling of something very much akin to loneliness, I watched Edward drive away and turned toward Mrs. Blake's residence as best I could. He returned in a short time, his manner still as distant as a prime minister's, and indicated that I was to follow him. I did so, and soon found myself in the same little study where Mrs. Blake received me two days before.

She was in no hurry to see me, but I did not worry about that. I had not lost my confidence in myself, and as the moments passed it seemed that my assurance grew stronger instead of diminishing. After all, she was but a woman like myself, and what it was possible for her to do was not impossible for me to accomplish. I was equally sure that if I went about my task in a determined manner she would be compelled to drop some hint, some word, make some movement or slip of tongue which would reveal to my highly strung senses whether it was really she who had caused Sylvia's mysterious disappearance. If she were innocent, then I would merely go on my way, taking with me her reply to the demand which I previously had made that she relinquish her claim on Edward.

It was when I was in one of these moments of mental abstraction that Mrs. Blake came into the room, and so noiseless were her movements that I did not hear her and did not know she was near me until my eye caught a glimpse of her skirts.

She was standing near the door through which she had made the hasty exit on the occasion of my last visit, but when she saw that I was aware of her presence she came toward me, her bespectacled eyes fastened upon me, her whole deportment studiously reserved and confident.

I arose as she got near me, but she waved to me quickly to resume my seat, and took one herself a few feet distant. Fortunately for me, her chair was so placed that her features were easily visible, while my own were in the shadow. This gave me the opportunity I wanted to observe her closely while we talked.

As on my previous visit, she waited for me to open the conversation, and I did not keep her waiting very long.

"Mrs. Blake," I began with as much firmness as I could command, "I have come for your answer."

"Until I spoke she had not taken her eyes from my face. She seemed to be making an attempt to hypnotize me, so steadily did she gaze at me, and so intense was her manner. But when I demanded her answer to my request I noticed an instantaneous change in her. It was as if one suddenly had touched a button which sent a current of electricity through her body. Every muscle she possessed seemed to stiffen as her neck swelled and her face reddened with passion. Her lips, tightened until they became a mere line, while her eyes closed slightly and her hands clenched as though she were making ready to strike. Her movements suggested those of some lower animal which suddenly had been goaded to fury and was about to attack its enemy."

As I looked at her my heart thumped with something very much like fear. I was ready for something terrible to happen, and would not have been surprised if she had drawn a revolver and shot me.

THE FIGHTING UNITS WANT AN OFFENSIVE

Feeling of Troops on Russian Front Changed During Past Week.

Petrograd, June 2.—A conference of soldiers' delegates from units now at the front has passed resolutions relating to the attitude of the men in the trenches dealing with the so-called fraternization. The conference declares that information published in the press was exaggerated. Isolated cases were not unknown at previous stages of the war, but it did not affect the fighting spirit of the army. The truth was the army was undergoing process of transformation, from which the men would issue stronger and more conscious of duty.

With regard to deserters, the conference was of the opinion that this reproach was in no wise applicable to the units at the front. The mass of desertions occurred exclusively from units in the rear. Sometimes fighting units waiting reinforcements received a red flag bearing the inscription, "War till victory," but the company which was to bring it failed to appear. The conference welcomed the order that all deserters should be punished with extreme severity.

A soldier tells me the feeling of the army at the front has changed in the past week in favor of an offensive. Not all realize how necessary this is for the cause for which democracy is fighting, but he believes the men will not fail to awaken to this necessity.

The Whig's Daily Menu

Hot Cheese Sandwiches

Spread six or eight slices of bread with butter, mixing a little mustard with the butter before using it. Trim the crusts off the bread and then sprinkle the slices with as much grated cheese as the butter will take up. Press the cheese well on to the butter, place two slices together, and then cut into convenient sized pieces. Beat up one egg on a plate, and mix it with one-half cup of milk and a little salt and paprika. Dip the sandwiches into this and let them soak for two minutes, then fry them in a small quantity of hot fat, browning them on both sides. Serve hot, sprinkled with a little grated cheese.
