

:: Our Photographer Pays a Visit to Canada's Indian Reservations ::

A real "Injun" on the western plains, dressed in his holiday attire, sounding the tom-tom.

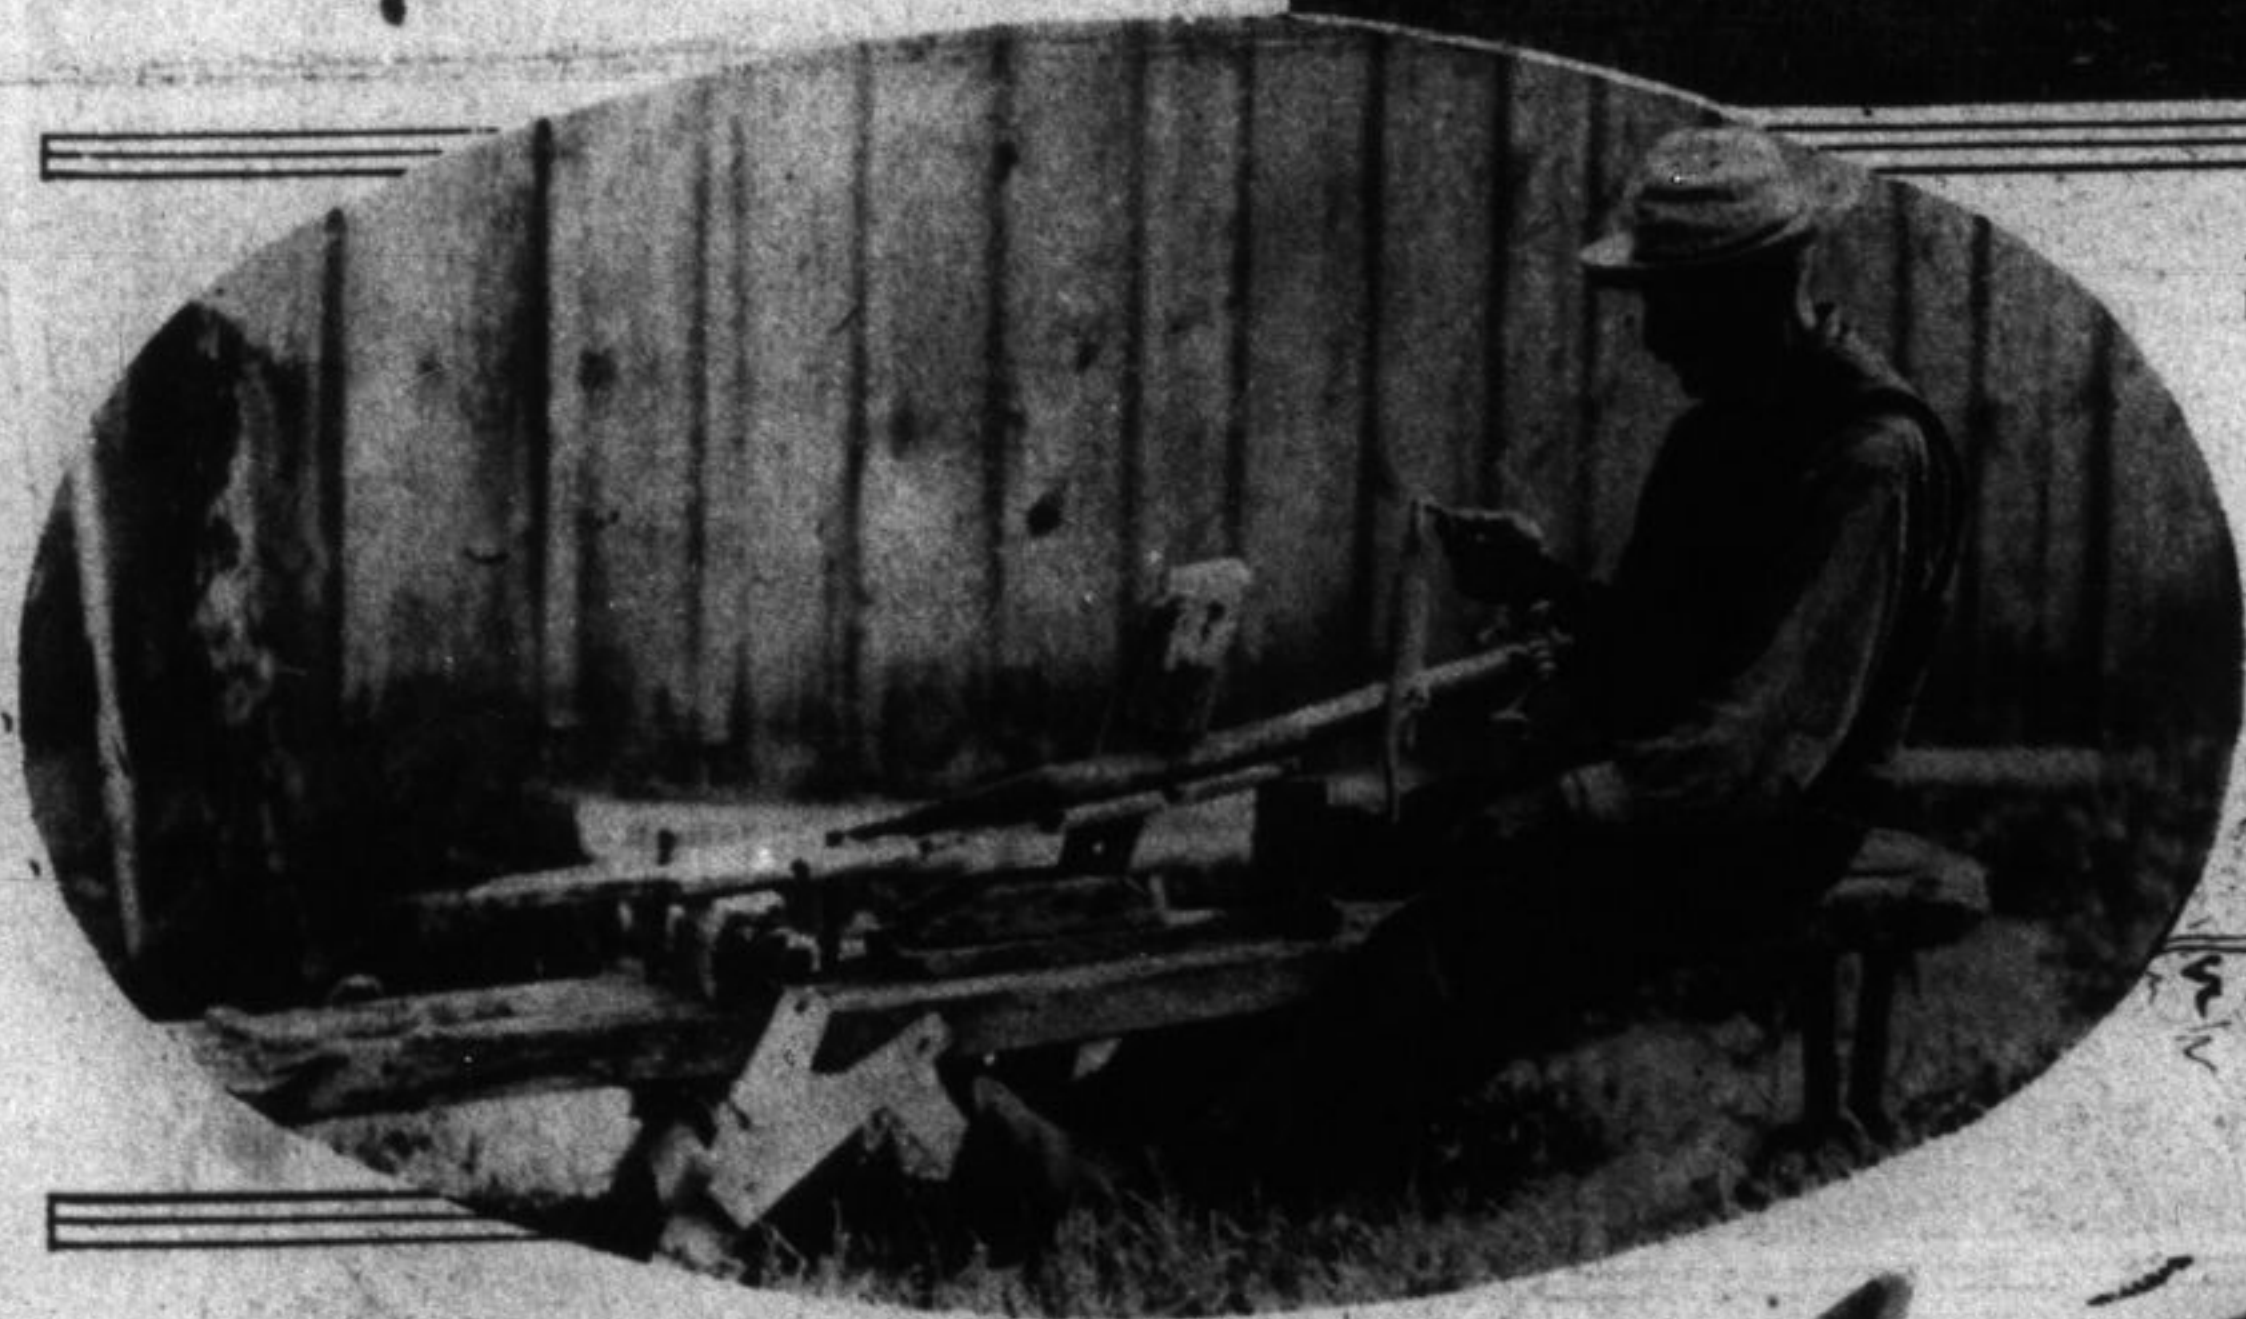

The ferry over the Sayecarte River at Walpole Island, Ontario, owned and operated by Indians.

A scene which brings to mind the early days in Canada's history, when the land was at the mercy of the red man. Now these few members of the Caughanaway tribe pose readily for the photographer.

A church on the Indian Reserve near Sarnia, Ontario. (Photo below.)

An Indian handle maker on the Ojibway Reserve near Sarnia. (Photo above.)

A study in concentration. Note the intent look on the face of this Ojibway as he fishes for mid-day meal. (Photo below.)

A very picturesque and natural pose of an Indian on the Blackfeet Indian Reserve in Western Canada.

A brave in scanty clothing, his squaw and papoose, with their Indian pony form the usual family group.

Indian and squaw of the Cowichan tribe of Flatheads at Anko-meanum, British Columbia. The man is 112 years old and the woman 108 years.

An Indian from the Calgary Hills in full costume.