AVIATORS IN DARING FLIGHTS DEFY DEATH

Many are the stories of daring aerial combats as well as equally reckless and foolish "stunts" performed in the air that are coming to this country every week from the great war centres and aviation training schools of Europe. Among the spectacular air combats was that in which Robert Mesinger, a noted German air pilot, met death. According to the Frankfurter Zeitung, the German had shot down four of the allied aviators before he met his own fate. During the fight one of the allied aviator's aeroplanes caught fire, and the latter, realizing that he was unable to escape death, rammed Mesinger's machine with the result that both aviators fell to the earth from a great height. The torpedoplane, invented by Rear Admiral Bradley A. Fiske. U. S. N., retired, has appealed to the German aviators to the extent that they have adopted or appropriated it, and by clever work have demonstrated that the American naval aerial forces will find it a useful instrument with which to invade German naval and submarine bases, to say nothing of sinking merchant ships, as shown in upper photo.
