Two Sports Contrasted.

Professional Lacrosse Players Show to Advantage.

A correspondent of The New York Sun points out that only one professional baseball player from the major leagues has enlisted in the American army. The sole representative is "Hank" Gowdy, formerly catcher for the Boston team in the National League. Other players have been photographed in uniforms, probably hired for publicity purposes. It is not a creditable showing for professional baseball. The players in the big leagues, whatever slight physical defects they might have, are all highly-trained athletes, more abled-bodied as a class than any other in the country. They are invariably well paid, some of them earning as much as $15,000 for five months' work. They are petted by the public, regarded as national heroes by the average school boy, and altogether rewarded and praised out of proportion to their services to humanity.

Baseball is the national game of the United States. It is interesting to contrast this showing with that of lacrosse, the national sport of Canada. The strange reluctance of prominent professional baseball players in the United States to show themselves loyal Americans cannot fail to have a blighting effect upon the efforts of the Sammies overseas to introduce the game in England as a worthy rival to cricket. Here in Canada all our professional baseball players in the United States will at least have to raise a battalion for service abroad.—The Mail and Empire.

Horace Creasy, the seventeen-year-old soldier guard at Trenton Chemical Works, committed for trial on a charge of shooting Henri Leppin, a workman, about to enter the plant, on account of not showing his pass has been discharged. The Grand Jury reported, "no bill."
