At Point Barrow, most northern land on the American continent. Dr. and Mrs. Norton, of the Smithsonian Institution, standing back of tame sled reindeer, with group of natives at right. Guide stands at the left.

One naturally thinks of tin soup plates on seeing this picture, but it is really the interior of an American factory which is turning out thousands of steel helmets for troops abroad. In the circles are the completed articles, shown inside and outside. They are real life savers.

The Lord Mayor's Show of 1917. The scene at the Mansion House—two tanks steaming round to take up their position. This year the Lord Mayor's Show was distinctly military in character, quite the most popular characters in the procession being the two tanks, which Londoners now had an opportunity of seeing at close quarters.

New portrait study of Albert, King of the Belgians. If all monarchs were like King Albert of the Belgians (He is not King of Belgium) the demand for republican institutions in Europe would not be so insistent. Albert is not only a constitutional monarch, exercising his royal prerogatives only by and with the consent of the people's representatives, but he is democratic in sentiment and genuinely concerned about the people's welfare.

Beersheba, the capture of which on the night of October 31st, turned the Turkish position on the sea front.

Little ones rehearsing at the entrance of a dug-out. Leading a train of small children to a very safe dug-out. The tiny ones, who regard it as a game, are seen holding on to each other's skirts and pinafores as they follow their leader. Nurses carry down the infants in arms.

A store of fodder for the Italian cavalry which has been opposing the enemy's advance.

A children's dug-out in London. To safeguard small children during daytime air raids, as a matter of common sense precaution at some hospitals and institutions in London where little ones are concentrated, bomb-proof dug-outs have been prepared and arrangements made for rapidly conducting and transferring children on a "Take Cover" warning.
