The Woman Who Changed

By JANE PHELPS

AN OLD MARRIED WOMAN

CHAPTER XVII.

I had talked bravely to Evelyn, but all the time I had a feeling that she was partly right; that Merton Gray WAS in love with me, as she had said. But I had no intention of admitting this even to Evelyn. I laughed at her for a silly girl, and told her she was mistaken.

That the bearing of Julia Collins toward George tinged that of my own toward Merton Gray I was aware. I was always more free with him, acted more pleased to be with him after I had been made unhappy because of their open liking for each other.

My uneasiness concerning George's relations with Julia Collins grew greater as the fall advanced. We were very gay, and it seemed to me they were together constantly. There was nothing really tangible, that is, nothing save my own fears and jealous imaginings; yet I felt positive that this woman whom George had known so intimately before we were married, and whom her best friend had said had been in love with him for years, was a menace to my happiness. That I must bend all my efforts to being like her if I were to compete with her.

The Charm of a Voice.

Julia Collins had a soft musical voice. George had often spoken of it to me when I became excited and spoke too loudly. Now every time I heard that soft languorous voice purring to him I fairly shuddered.

I not only loved my husband but I WANTED to love him. I had read somewhere that when love is dead it is more often dislike or aversion that springs up in its place than friendship or even tolerance. That people who lose love out of their lives very often lose a large slice of their character as well.

Often when I read such things as this I would be morbid. I had tried so hard, and had accomplished so little. The kindness of the summer seemed now so far away. George was once more the critical, fault-finding mentor. There seemed scarcely a day when I did not displeasure him in something. When he corrected me, he frequently said it was for my good he did it; but I couldn't feel that it did me any good. I felt I was growing hard and bitter; that all the sweetness was being extracted from my life.

I was in this mood one night when we attended a large reception given by Geraldine Ross. All the way Mrs. George had talked of my harsh voice. I had answered her rather quickly when he hurried me as I dressed.

"I suppose you are wishing I had a voice like Mrs. Collins," I finally said, exasperated.

"Certainly do. It is a pleasure to listen to her speak."

"After hearing your strident tones no one could blame me."

"Thank you! I will try not to inflict them upon you oftener than is necessary." I returned just as we reached the house. How I had the courage to say such a thing I don't know. But the look he gave me when he assisted me from the car showed he would not easily forget nor forgive my foolish speech.

Merton Gray sympathized.

"You are unhappy tonight!" Merton Gray said without preamble as we stood together. George had devoted himself, almost from the moment we arrived, to Julia Collins. One could scarcely blame him, I thought bitterly as I looked at her. She was marvellously beautiful, in short black and red, and aside from her beauty there was something compelling about her. "Heady," I heard Bert Ross say to Madge Loring.

"Not exactly," I replied to Merton, trying to speak naturally and to smile. Both efforts were failures.

"Tell me," he urged, drawing me away from those who could hear.

"What has happened?"

"Nothing—that is, nothing new," although I tried to laugh there was intense bitterness in my voice.

"Old things are sometimes hard to bear," he said as we sat down in a deserted corner of the room.

"If I were different, I wouldn't care! Most women, you know—of your set, wouldn't!"

"You haven't told me what it is yet."

"Nothing—as I told you, save praise of another woman. Praise of her voice, and blame for mine. It is the little things we fuss over, isn't it?" I tried desperately to put a little gaiety into my voice.

"Always. And just as always, the things we should not allow to annoy us; that is we shouldn't nine times out of ten." Then more seriously: "You of all women I know should not be hurt because another's voice is praised. Anyone who sings as you do certainly should not be hurt over such a trifle."

TALKING IT OVER With Lorna Moon

Tango Harry lounges around in the hotel lobby. He has a perplexed expression and a hand-dog slouch of the shoulders. He seems to be perpetually asking WHY? WHY? He is wondering what has happened to his former popularity. There was a time when girls competed for his attentions. They loved to be seen dancing with him for he had all the grace of a Vernon Castle on the floor.

But now Betty Briggs spends an eight hour day in a pair of greasy overalls studying the different parts of a truck motor. She hasn't any time for Tango Harry. She seems to have forgotten that he spent hours teaching her lap dog Fifi how to ask for sugar. In fact she sold Fifi and gave the money to the Red Cross.

And pretty Mary Mathews has lost all interest in "new steps." She thinks only of bandages, and spends most of her day in a Red Cross garb has a way of looking over Tango Harry's head when he tells her so.

When he calls on Mabel—who was the ballroom wall flower and was glad of any little crumb of attention—she makes him hold wool while HIS name is Fighting Ted!

Get Extra Dividends

June is the month to make each square foot of ground in the garden yield extra dividends by intensive utilization of space between rows—Ed plants. For instance, tomatoes set out late in May do not begin to spread much before July. Even then their spreading tendency should be checked by providing supports of some sort. Lettices, radishes and other crops that mature quickly, may be grown between tomatoes, peppers and eggplants.

Extra sowings of cucumbers should be made at this time to help you out with your pickle supply. The plants and fruits develop very quickly at this season. By pinching out the centre of shoots, cucumber vines can be restricted to surprisingly limited space without seriously limiting the number of "cukes" you are going to have.
