RUTH IS DIAPPOINTED

CHAPTER CXXV.

Now followed a period of waiting for Ruth—waiting for Brian's letter in reply to the one she had written about the baby. She watched nervously for the reported arrival of ships; and was disappointed in not hearing from him—long before it would have been possible for a letter to reach her.

Mandel wondered at the change in her; at her repressed manner. "She is anxious over something," he said to himself, just as he had said a short time before: "She is unhappy over something," then set himself to think of something to divert her.

Arthur, Mandel longed for Ruth, yet his thought for her was singularly unselfish. The great melting pot of war, and war activities, had ennobled the man. He longed to see her happy, regardless of his own love for her. And whenever he saw her looking worried or anxious, he almost cursed Brian because of it.

He constantly gave her all the consideration possible in her work, but even so she carried a great deal of responsibility. He often wondered what he should have done in this crisis without her. Many of his clerks were either overseas or in camps. Some had volunteered, others been drafted. Like other business men, he was slowly replacing them either with men above the draft age, or with women. But it takes time to induct new help into such an establishment; and mistakes are costly. So Ruth often went home wearied in body and mind.

Little Brian was growing fast, and Mrs. Clayborne said, bid fair to be entirely spoiled when he became old enough to take advantage. Dir Rachel, wearing her "Little Miss" and Ruth idolized him. Mrs. Clayborne loved him dearly; although in her heart she regretted that he was growing to resemble Brian.

"I wish he had looked like Ruth," she often murmured when she looked at the tiny features. True, to her determination, she tried to make things more lively for Ruth. She invited first Mr. and Mrs. Curtiss, then Mr. and Mrs. Roberts in for cards, and occasionally to dinner. They were almost the only friends Ruth had made, so their circle was necessarily limited. Then once in a while she would ask Mr. Mandel. She was often puzzled by his manner when with Ruth. That he loved her niece she knew; but that he was becoming so unselfish in that love that Ruth's happiness, not his own, was his first consideration, she had not realized.

When finally a letter came from Brian, Ruth's hands trembled so she scarcely could open it. To her almost unbearable disappointment it was not in reply to the one telling him he was a father, but a belated one written about the time she had sent her own.

Tears of disappointment filled her eyes as she read. Then a fear took possession of her; fear that Brian might never know. He had expected to be sent from the place where she had addressed the letter; and more than half expected—as he expressed it—to be in the fighting line when she received the letter.

He was plainly enthusiastic over the idea—rebellious because of the long waiting. He pictured the exploits of some of the men who had gone over the top with honor and safety in glowing terms; and spoke of those who had gone west in the discharge of their duty as fortunate to have the privilege to die for their country.

Then he spoke again of Mollie. He told how she cheered the wounded, both our own boys and the blesses of France. How brave she was, and how she hesitated at nothing, no matter how menial the task to help.

"There are many like her over here," he wrote, "but I tell you of her because you know her. The men all love her. They call her 'Little Mother' and she does mother them all, from bearded men to boys of seventeen, many of whom I strongly suspect have lied about their ages to fight for Uncle Sam. But such lies will not be held against them should they go West now; or should they come through. Of that I am sure."

"I looked for a letter to-day but none reached me. The mails are so uncertain that I am not blaming you, but them. I feel that there is a nice, long letter from you somewhere, waiting to be delivered to me, and I will try to possess my soul in patience until it appears. By the way, send me more chocolate next time. I have found a chum over here whose sweet tooth beats anything I ever heard of. So send me a double measure if you expect me to get a single cake. His name is 'Henderson,' 'Larry' his front name. He has your address, so in case I am injured he will let you know. So unless you hear from him you may know that I am O.K. and loving you. Brian."

TALKING IT OVER With Lorna M.

A False Alarm

Here is an extract from her letter: "And now he has taken her to work in his own office. It was bad enough when she worked in the same building where he had to go frequently on business, but I shall never be happy a moment now, knowing that he is spending over her giving dictation and seeing her all day. What chance have I, his wife, against a young stenographer who spends all she makes upon clothes?"

Really, Mary, if I did not get this type of letter so often I would be sure that you were trying to be funny.

I can't imagine any woman being jealous of her husband or sweetheart's stenographer. This is the time for you to say can-can. If you were any danger of suffering rivalry that is over us.

wood seem as to bungle, but when she saw his eyes, I can't begin to flit with married women. There are two types. I heard a girl bragging them thus, "I'm a stenographer, but I never work for a man. I did she would be far in love with me." "Just about right," she said, "but they could be many wonderful things. I remember, but they are not the type that waste hours of their time during business hours. As a stenographer, you must also remember, that an average man is a husband, a man that, and a lover. It is the only time he spends with this girl is during business hours. You may be sure that she stands very poor chance of being a stenographer. Why, I didn't realize that you worked in my office."
