Trawlers of North Sea.

"The northeast coast of Scotland is pacific in climate, as compared with the Atlantic storminess that rules the sea-girt land on the west," writes William Elliot Griffin in "Bonnie Scotland and What We Owe Her," and he goes on later in the same chapter to speak of the trawlers of the North Sea.

At Aberdeen "twenty-five millions of dollars' worth of food is extracted annually through the fisheries in the deeper waters, which have been improved, first by the method of beam trawling, begun in 1882, and then by the steam line fishing in 1889.

"How full the North Sea is of these trawlers those know who have seen them and kept pace with the efforts of philanthropists to minister to the needs of the men on board the ships. In recent years we have learned, moreover, how soon, in time of war, these toilers of the deep are called upon to show their courage as well as their industry, and have thus realized the danger ever surrounding these modest heroes. In the world war of 1914-18, the trawlers have not only caught fish, but in their new capacity, as mine-sweepers, have kept the North Sea measurably free."

Democratic Air Raids.

Official details issued recently of twenty-five air raids on London between May 13, 1915, and May 19, 1918, completely dispel the idea that while the poorer classes suffered great loss West End residents entirely escaped.

The reports of the London Fire Brigade show that in the raid of November 28, 1916, the residences of the following well-known people were damaged:

- Lieut.-Gen. Sir Alfred Codrington
- Lord Gascoigne Cecil
- Lady Jane Taylor
- Lady Wernher
- Duke of Devonshire
- Marquess of Salisbury
- Marquess of Zeland
- Lord Northcliffe
- Earl of Yarborough
- Duke of Rutland.
