High Turbans and Henry VIII. Caps Are Featured for Autumn.
 Paris, Aug. 27.—Did the leaders of the military bands in the Victory March or the enthusiasm for the Italian soldiery impress upon the minds of the milliners that high turbans might have a vogue of popularity if exploited just now? Whatever the reason, the interesting fact has occurred. Dotted the beaches, filling the restaurants where tea is served in truly English manner, though most of the French take orangeade, are the high turbans. They have a rival in the crushed cap of Henry VIII, which is made of velvet, the face must be oval to wear one, and the round-faced woman is permitted the other. The Americans here have appeared in the crushed cap along with formal afternoon dress, choosing horizon blue and amethyst for the colors. The French, it must be admitted, carry off the swag of the high stiff turban with more style than we do, unless there chances to be an American who has the slim face with its pointed chin that characterizes the French women of class.

Daring High Trimming.
 The stiff cockade that presses itself against the front of the drum major's hat is lacking in the new turbans, but there is no tendency to entirely obliterate high trimming. On some of these shapes there is a broad wing that spreads itself outward as it goes upward, ending in soft tendrils. On others there is a swirl of Paradise, or whatever feathery fines stand for the original. No one can wear such a hat off the forehead so the timid impetus toward showing a fringe of hair over the brow may be set back for months. The Henry VIII. turban, however, has its posse settled by the individual, and one sees quite an array of curled fringes under the edge of the colored velvet. It may be that the stiffness of the military turbans will melt and they will assume the softly crushed shape that women appear to like. At present they stand alone in their rebelliousness. A woman who wears a conspicuous one the other day carried a stout, rather short, gold-headed cane in her hand. One hoped she would give it a twirl, a flourish, and throw it in the air, then catch it.

One for Round, the Other for Oval Face

Some big names are behind both the drum major's hat and the Henry VIII cap of velvet. The face must be oval to wear one, and the round-faced woman is permitted the other. The Americans here have appeared in the crushed cap along with formal afternoon dress, choosing horizon blue and amethyst for the colors. The French, it must be admitted, carry off the swag of the high stiff turban with more style than we do, unless there chances to be an American who has the slim face with its pointed chin that characterizes the French women of class.

Along with the suggestions that the hat was copied, although exaggerated, from the military cap worn by the Italian connected with the mission in the Hotel Edouard Sept, comes the vivid remembrance of the wild applause given the Italian contingent along the entire route of the Victory Parade on the Fourteenth of July. It was an outburst that surprised and interested all the onlookers, especially the Anglo-Saxons. It was put down to the Latin bond. By others it was ascribed to the splendid fighting by the Italian army which had won the sentence in the recent speech of General Haig that the Italians did little, when he made his now famous statement that the men of England must never forget that the British Empire won the war. Coming as it did, on the eve of the Victory March, that speech got under the French skin. As the Americans were entirely left out of General Haig's summary of the part of the Allies in the war, they were not quite sure how they felt.

Whether or not the French people intended to show the world what they thought of the Italians regardless of governments, generals, and such, the feature of the applause given by miles of French men and women to the Italian contingent made gossip that ran through the boulevards like an escaped balloon. Then came the high tide of the two are linked in the minds of those who watch fashion as it is related to events.

WHEN YOU BAKE A CAKE

With the tyro in cooking the bugaboo of cake making is in the rising. Mixing the batter is a matter of accurate following of a good rule, but the matter of rising seems to be a mystery. Along with the suggestions that the hat was copied, although exaggerated, from the military cap worn by the Italian connected with the mission in the Hotel Edouard Sept, comes the vivid remembrance of the wild applause given the Italian contingent along the entire route of the Victory Parade on the Fourteenth of July. It was an outburst that surprised and interested all the onlookers, especially the Anglo-Saxons. It was put down to the Latin bond. By others it was ascribed to the splendid fighting by the Italian army which had won the sentence in the recent speech of General Haig that the Italians did little, when he made his now famous statement that the men of England must never forget that the British Empire won the war. Coming as it did, on the eve of the Victory March, that speech got under the French skin. As the Americans were entirely left out of General Haig's summary of the part of the Allies in the war, they were not quite sure how they felt.

Then much depends on the oven. However, you may wish to economize in using your gas oven it is best not to attempt to cook anything else in the oven at the same time that you bake cakes. If you attempt to bake potatoes for dinner, for instance, unless you put them in the back of the oven before you begin the cake, and leave them there until after your cake has come out, you may spoil your cake as a result of your potatoes, and if you cook the potatoes that way it is doubtful whether the potatoes will not suffer in consequence. Plan to light the oven two or three minutes before putting the cake in. Even if you want a slow oven this is a good idea as in this way you can test the heat of the oven before the cake is put in. Remember that for a slow oven a better temperature is secured if you reduce the heat by diminishing the flow of gas rather than by opening the plate warmer above or the broiler below to cool the oven. A loaf cake should be baked in a decidedly slow oven, because it is important to have it done to the centre and to have this cooking process begin before the crust forms on the outside of the cake. With small cakes it is not so difficult, but they are best when cooked in a moderately quick oven. It is always a bad idea to reduce the temperature after you have begun as this is one of the easiest ways to make the cake fall. Therefore, in baking a loaf cake, if you want to be on the safe side, begin in quite a cool oven and then as the cake seems to be cooking you might add a little more heat to aid the rising process.

A very usual way to make cakes fall is to open the door for inspection too often. It is never necessary to open it more than an inch or so in order to see the cake. Once the cake has risen and seems to be "set" you need not be so cautious.
