face of the most frightful calamities I attended a small dinner at which the Premier was present, four days after the Germans made their terrible attack in March, 1918. Even on this occasion he showed no evidence of strain: as usual his animated spirits held the upper hand; he was talking incessantly, but he never even mentioned the subject that was absorbing the thoughts of the rest of the world at that moment; instead he rattled along, touching upon the Irish question, discussing the impression which Irish conscription would make in America, and, now and then, pausing to pass some bantering remark to Mr. Balfour. This was the way that I always saw the head of the British Government; never did I meet him when he was fagged or discouraged, or when he saw anything but a fa-
