shabbily-dressed negress. Thus Edith Wharton relates her visit to the Moroccan Sultan's harem in the October Yale Review. Traversing a hot daxzle of polychrome tiles, we reached another archway guarded by the chief eunuch, a towering black with the enamelled eyes of a basalt bust. The Eunuch delivered us to other negresses, and we entered a labyrinth of inner passages and patios, all murmuring and dripping with water. Passing down long corridors where slaves in dim grayish garments flattened themselves against the walls, we caught glimpses of great dark rooms, laundries, pantries, bakeries, kitchens where savory things were brewing and stewing, and where more negresses, abandoning their pots and pans, came to peep at us from the threshold. In one common the common that the common the common the common that the common the common the common the common that the common the common that the common the common that the common threshold. Stepping softly on her embroidered slippers, she led us to the next landing, where another golden-slippered being smiled out on us, a little girl this one, blushing and dimpling under a jeweled dem and pearl-woven braids. On a third landing a third damsel appeared, and encircled by the three graces we mounted to the tall mirador in the central tower, from which we were to look down at the coming lishing of branches of Canadian ceremony. One by one our little guides, kicking off their golden shoes, which a slave laid neatly outside the door, led us on soft bare feet into the upper chamber of the harem.
