LOVE and MARRIED LIFE by the noted author Idah McGlone Gibson

Who Pays?
"Yes," I answered Helen, "that is what I said: 'If love were only all!'"
"And Anthony Hope made his heroine understand that love is not all. A few months ago I thought he was mistaken, but I know now that he was right. While love has been called the greatest thing in the world," continued Helen, "there are many other things of life that bulk almost as large."
"Helen, dear," I interrupted, "aren't you happy? Have you found out that you have made a mistake?"
"Is Bobby?"
Helen held up her hand.
"Bobby is everything I could wish," she said loyally, "but no two people, no matter how much they love each other, can absolutely defy the conventions of society and not pay the price. Neither can two people live in a world populated by other human beings and be outside of certain rules to which society subscribes."
"You know, Katherine, dear, that Bobby is the most generous of men. He is not happy unless he is returning the warm handshake of a friend, or raising his hat chivalrously while he smiles at a pretty woman acquaintance. Why, Katherine, that is one of the reasons his love for Ruth cooled. She didn't go with him among his friends and he felt that he must either stay at home with her when he would have been happier among a group."
"I would go anywhere with him but society won't let me come within its doors. I'm Bobby's wife, legally, but for some capricious reason I am sent to Coventry."

Broke One of the Laws.
"Not a capricious reason, my dear," I said. "You simply broke one of those laws that you have just been describing."
"And the woman pays," said Helen bitterly.
"Yes, even yet the woman pays," I answered.
"I have persuaded Bobby to take a long trip," said Helen with an effort, "and he is leaving to-morrow morning."
"Oh, I am so sorry!"
"Don't worry about me, Katherine, if you will only let me see you occasionally I shall not be lonely, and I think that Bob and I have got to the point where we must be separated a little while. We have been too much together."
"Oh, aren't you going with him?"
"No."
"Oh, I'm so glad! It clears up everything for me!" I exclaimed.
"What do you mean, Katherine?"
"I am more glad to see you than you can possibly know," he said. "John has been telling me ever since we came to town that you were too ill to see anyone, and I have known all the time that Helen was longing to come and see you. I tried to make her go, but she said she was not of this class-tray does on the subject of first calls and so forth seemed to have gotten into her head."
Helen looked at me significantly.
"Just think, Bobby," she said.
"Katherine has come to ask me if I would go with her to some quiet place where she can recuperate further. She was rather afraid to come, as she thought you would not wish to be left alone, but when I told her you were going away and I could accompany her as well as not, she was simply delighted."
"You can go better than not, honey," said Bob as he stooped to kiss her.
"Oh, I'm so glad! It clears up everything for me!" I exclaimed.
"What do you mean, Katherine?"

What You Can Do to Make Your Forehead More Beautiful

BY LUCREZIA BOMI
The Famous Spanish Prima Donna

"Her brow is like the snowdrift," says Burns to Annie Laurie. The brows of many other beauties have inspired the poets of all ages because there is something even more than mere beauty expressed by the forehead. The nobility of the countenance and the brain that governs the intelligence we associate with the brow, and a great measure of the beauty of the face is found in the brow or forehead.
The beauty of your forehead is governed by your hairline, your eyebrows and the texture of your skin. Since your hairline determines whether your forehead is classed as high or low you may freely influence the effect of its contour by the arrangement of your hair.
If your forehead is too high and protrudes you should dress your hair so that it falls softly over your brow, cutting down its height. This breaking of the height may also be accomplished by parting your hair in the middle and putting it out softly on each side, keeping it drawn together in the centre so as to modify the height of the part. The parted arrangement of your hair is more apt to show the height of your forehead than the pompadour unless your hair is very fluffy.

The soft pompadour is generally a better arrangement of the hair for the high forehead, although parting it on one side and brushing it down in a wavy line on the forehead is frequently best.
An ideal forehead is particularly well set off with the hair brushed smoothly back. However, not every face can stand this hairline. It usually requires large eyes to wear it well, because a great deal of "character" in the expression is necessary to carry this severe coiffure.
Your eyebrows are an important feature in your forehead. Arching the eyebrows without taking into consideration the other features has spoiled the beauty of many a forehead.
A woman with strongly modelled features, whether regular or irregular, is apt to have brows in keeping with the size of her nose and mouth. If she thin out this line to the tiny arch encouraged by some so-called beauty doctors, she makes herself look ridiculous with these disproportionate brows totally out of keeping with the rest of her face.
If, however, your brows meet in the middle, or if stray hairs grow between them, it is as feasible to thin them out or to clear the space between your brows. Any wayward hairs that persist in growing out of line may be pulled out with a tiny pair of tweezers.
The texture of your skin is an important element in the beauty of your forehead. If you have wrinkles in your brow you should try to eradicate them with massage. If you have a chronic frown you should try to get rid of it by consulting an oculist good soap and warm water will help you keep your skin smooth and white. A teaspoonful of benzoin added to a basin of warm water when bathing your forehead will be found whitening to your skin. In using powder on your forehead be sure to brush it out of your eyebrows with a tiny eyebrow brush and always use an eyebrow brush after bathing your face.

Please remember that in going slow you may go longer.
