LOVE and MARRIED LIFE by the noted author Idah McGione Gibson

Visit from Helen and Bob. Mother had been softly sleeping in the other room while we were dining, and all at once I saw Charles spring to his feet and incline his ear toward the doorway. At the sound of a peculiar little gasping sigh we simultaneously rushed for the door and came together with a shock that would have taken me off my feet if Charles had not thrown his arms around me to steady me. With his arms still about me we hurried to mother's cot and found her gasping in pain. We worked over her for some minutes before she was able to do anything but moan and it seemed to me that she would never be able to speak to me again. When I looked at Charles in supplication: "Can't you do something more? Has she had these attacks often?" I asked.

"No," he answered; "we are doing everything we can; we just have to wait until the pain passes, but every time she has one of these attacks it leaves her weaker." This he said to me while I was holding the spoon in which he was pouring drop by drop a powerful medicine.

Her Head Trembles. My hand trembled so that I could not hold the spoon and so he took it from me and I marvelled to see how carefully he measured the fluid and how dexterously he raised my mother's head to allow her to swallow the draught. "Charles has been a better son to my mother than I have been a daughter," I thought to myself, and I felt very guilty because I realized that although he loved my mother much of the care he was giving to her was bestowed because he loved me.

Some sages have said that propinquity spells affinity, but it does not in the case of Charles and me. He grew up in my father's family and had always called my mother "mother." I do not know the time that he did not love me more than he did a sister. I am very fond of him. I lean upon him more than any other person I have known, and yet the mere thought of the man I married gives me a greater thrill than I have ever known from Charles' most wonderful devotion.

My mother came slowly back to a world that was not made wholly of pain. She smiled at Charles and me, and her eyelids closed as though she was satisfied to be with those of all the world she loved best. I know it was a great disappointment to my mother that I had not married Charles, but the marriage vow is so sacred to her that after she knew that I had wedded John she never mentioned her blasted hopes.

Made a Great Mistake. Now more than ever, I am sure, she feels that I made a great mistake, but I know that she will never indicate this to me in any way. Finally Charles left me to prepare my mother for bed. She hardly stirred even when the telephone rang and I found that Helen and Bobbie had come over for a week-end visit with me.

"I wanted to see you, Katherine," said Helen, "and Bobbie was tired after his trip, so we decided we could have a little rest over here. You can't tell how happy he is that we have picked up our friendship again. We won't think of coming up to-night as your mother is ill, but we'll see you in the morning as soon as you will let us."

"I have just helped mother to bed," I answered, "and I will be glad if you will both come up to my sitting room. I want you to meet my cousin who came over with my mother. You know, he has always been like a brother to me and a son to her."

"Don't let us disturb you," said Helen.

"I shall be very glad to have you come because I am not very sleepy and I can do nothing for mother. I want to tell you how much I have missed you."

Her Greatest Fault. "Did you dear? That makes me very happy. I do not have so many friends nowadays that the thought that some one misses me does not make me feel a glow about my heart. However, I won't talk any more over the phone. Bob says that's one of my greatest faults. We will be right up."

I hastily changed into a soft negligee which I had not had time to do during mother's seizure. "Charles!" I called, "the Gaylords are coming up. I want you to meet them."

I came into the room just as Helen and Bobbie walked in. One view of Helen's face and I knew that her poem was right—the ghost stalked between.

REAL ESTATE SITUATION

IN KINGSTON THIS SEASON IS VERY ACUTE.

There Are Two Buyers For Every Property on the Market—Rents and Prices Will Go Still Higher.

The situation in the real estate market in Kingston this spring reported by agents to be unusually acute. Formerly it was possible to satisfy enquirers for property, but they are unable to do this any longer. Owing to the shortage of the better class of property in respect to location, etc., there are ten buyers for every five properties on the market. The greatest demand seems to be for small modern houses costing in the neighborhood of $5,000, but there is very little property of this character available. There are cheap properties, but owing to location and other circumstances they are not in so great demand. The $5,000 house is modern, built within the last twenty years, and up-to-date in respect to heating, plumbing, etc. While cheaper properties were built during that period, they were not always in the best localities. Older properties in many cases have out-of-date fixtures and require improvements of one kind and another, and the resident who is buying a home or putting his money into an investment wants the best property. Of course, locality is always an important consideration, and this has much to do with rents at the present time, much more than the agents have.

People will pay higher rent to get a house in the desired locality, and the offices of the Kingston real estate agents are called up every hour of the day for houses to rent. The demand is greater than the supply, and more building should be done this season in an endeavor to meet the requirements. Inquiry at all of the real estate offices shows the same condition on this very important matter, and there is no prospect of any building programme this season bringing down rents and prices. The question of cost enters very largely into the matter of prices and rents. Some items of building specifications have gone up 150 per cent. in ten years, and nearly all have increased 100 per cent. This has discouraged many builders who formerly built on speculation, and few houses have been put up during the last year or two. When asked his opinion of real estate as an investment, one prominent city dealer stated that it was one of the best investments obtainable at present prices. Evidently he expects to see further advances in values and rents rather than a decline.

MARRIED ON WEDNESDAY.

Joyous Occasion at Home of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Sharmann. A very pretty wedding took place Wednesday, March 10th, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Sharmann, 274 University avenue, when their eldest daughter, Flossie H. M., was united in marriage to Ronald A. S., son of Mr. and Mrs. Colin Campbell, Prescott. The Rev. J. D. Ellis, of Queen street Methodist church, officiated. The bride, given away by her father, looked charming in a gown of white French brocade metal cloth with an overdress of georgette and silk lace, trimmed with pearls. The long pearl train was a continuation of the veil, which fell from a lovely arranged deep ruche of tulle

She wore the bridegroom's present, a sunburst of pearls with diamond centre, and carried a bouquet of American beauty roses. Mrs. Sharmann, mother of the bride, looked very becoming in a dress of mauve silk and wool royal armine, with an overdress of mauve georgette crepe and a white georgette crepe vest and collar. Her flowers were a bouquet of violets. After the ceremony the bride received congratulations, and the many guests sat down to a sumptuous wedding breakfast. The wedding gifts were numerous and costly, showing the high esteem in which the bride is held by her many friends. The bride's going away suit was of navy blue serge, with a blue straw and broadcated silk hat and fox fur. The bride and groom left on the afternoon train for eastern points, where they will spend their honeymoon.
