LOVE and MARRIED LIFE by the noted author Idah McGione Gibson

Helen and Bob: "Is there anything I can do?" said Alice, following me into my room, where my nurse was packing. "No, dear, I think everything has been done," I said as I looked out the room.

"Everything has been packed and put in order," said the nurse, "and I think I had better leave; you know your doctor only telephoned to me last night because you were in such a bad state and I stayed on to help you this morning."

"You had better stay with Mrs. Gordon and go with her to her home," said Alice.

There was great relief in my face when I heard this, for I was quite sure that John would not approve of anything of the kind and I felt it seemed to me almost necessary that someone should go who had been with me during my stay at Atlantic City. Poor old Hannah, my mother's maid, would not be able to take charge of things in the way that my capable nurse would and then I had a queer sinking feeling that after the whole thing was over I should probably collapse.

"I am going down stairs now," said Alice, "to talk to Helen awhile." "Are you, dear? How sweet of you."

Rather Ashamed of It. "Oh, I'm rather ashamed about the way I treated Helen," she said. "Not that I approve of her conduct entirely, you know, but I have almost come to the conclusion that as long as we do not know just exactly what we would do in matters of this kind, if we were placed in the same circumstances as Helen, it is not quite the thing for her lifelong friends to cast the first stone."

"Oh, Alice, that is the first comforting thing I have had said to me since you have come down."

"I didn't know I made quite such a batch of it, Katherine," she answered. "Why, I came down here to help you if I could."

"You have helped me more than I could possibly have desired, Alice, dear. Do you really know that Helen's life happiness almost depends upon you?"

"What do you mean, Katherine?" "I mean just this, that unless Bob and Helen are able to make friends again with their old acquaintances" their love is going to be wrecked on the shoals of doubt."

Doing the Right Thing. "Being young, Bob and Helen felt that they were doing the right thing, the great thing in declaring their love to the world. Of course, they could not understand that such a declaration would mean 'thumbs down' for them. You know them both so well that you know Bobbie is only happy when he has many of his friends and acquaintances about him. That is the very reason that he began to love Helen instead of Ruth. Helen told me that Ruth lost him because she would not entertain his friends or be entertained by them. Helen, you know, is very fond of company and she thought that she could make Bob's home a centre of social life for him. Instead, her marriage to him has cut him off more completely from his friends than Ruth's opposition to them. Alice, you have social position in the town where Bob and Helen have come to live. It will enable you to help them in many ways, and I am sure that you can do this much better than I, because you will have no opposition from Tom, your husband."

Characters Not Changed. "Oh, Alice, you must understand that Bob's and Helen's characters have not changed. They are just the same, sweet, sympathetic people that we have always known. I do not think that I could have lived down here if Helen had not been with me part of the time."

"Wasn't Karl Shepard down here?" was Alice's unexpected query. "Yes, he was here one day, at least, I saw him one evening."

"He did not tell me in so many words that he had seen you," said Alice, "but I gathered it from something he said."

There was a suggestive silence for a moment and then Alice said, "I thought he would ask me to buy you some flowers when I told him about your loss, but he didn't. Perhaps it is just as well. I don't want him to grow too fond of you, dear. He is too fine a man to nurse a hopeless love."

"What do you mean, Katherine?" "I mean just this, that unless Bob and Helen are able to make friends again with their old acquaintances"

occasion to give of their time and their money in order that London may be a better place in which to live.

Upon the other hand, the number of fault-finders sometimes seems to be without limit. This is not to say that there is no reason for criticism. Usually, if not always, they are individual failures, and the matter for surprise is not so much that they are irreconcilable but that they are able to obtain an audience. Perhaps it is true that they will soon be as extinct as the dodo. They ought to be.

place to the extent of attempting to accomplish something.

As Mr. Sclanders says, a city's worst enemies are its grouches. That is, those who are chronically dissatisfied. These throw cold water upon every forward movement; they stand in the way of change and progress. Usually, if not always, they are individual failures, and the matter for surprise is not so much that they are irreconcilable but that they are able to obtain an audience. Perhaps it is true that they will soon be as extinct as the dodo. They ought to be.

There's always trouble when the ignorant individual attempts to formulate his safe and sane policy.
