LOVE and MARRIED LIFE

Thoughts of Karl. While I was preparing for the...

Although every word in Karl's letter stood engraved on the tablets of my memory, yet, womanlike, I was almost afraid that I was misinterpreting some of it.

He had never attempted to caress me. He had never, but once, even kissed my hand, and that was the time, at the club just after my severe illness, when John became so unreasonably jealous.

No Caressing Cadence. Even when Karl snatched me back from the storm darkened waters of the Atlantic his voice held no caressing cadence. Indeed, that was the only time he had spoken brusquely to me during our acquaintance. And yet to me, that short quick sentence: "Don't be a fool," held perhaps the greatest love token he had ever given me, because the words were so full of the terror from which he had saved me. And blended with the horror in his voice was another note—a love note which indicated the anguish he would feel at my loss.

Even the letter from him that I had just received and destroyed did not tell me so much of his feelings as that quick decisive exclamation, combined with his hard grasp on my arm as he pulled me back.

Although, when a woman's heart is torn and bleeding from real or fancied neglect of her husband, there is a sweet solace in the fact that some other man believes her to be desirable above all others, yet I am not sure this knowledge is at all productive of peace of mind. I almost wish that Karl had not sent me that letter, it was something that I could not show to John even if I had kept it. It was the first thing that had happened since I was married that I had the least desire to keep from him, and because it was really so comforting to me it made me feel as though I had actually done something wrong.

Determined to Tell.

I determined to tell Alice about it, because after what I had heard of her conversation with John it seemed to me that she would look upon the episode from a common-sense viewpoint, at least. I knew that I could not ask Helen about it, because notwithstanding she had not found the path she had taken most desirable, I knew that she would counsel me to immediately separate from John if I felt that in our married life must be always a straining of the cords of matrimony.

Of one thing, however, I was determined, and that was the what, over John would say, however angry or hurt he should feel. I would insist upon the economic independence that my mother's bequest would give me.

I almost smiled to myself as I thought how like it was to have settled the entire business of my little patrimony without asking me any thing about it.

"Are you quite sure you are fully able to go through with the business this afternoon," said my nurse as she held me to dress.

"I certainly am," I answered. I am feeling perfectly well again; in fact, I feel better than I did any time at Atlantic City."

Too Much Thinking. "Yes, Mrs. Gordon, I think you do," observed my nurse quietly. "I have noticed since I have been with you that you are the kind of woman who must have an engrossing interest to be perfectly well, otherwise you are very apt to think too much of yourself."

"Porgive me, won't you, for saying this. Perhaps by doing so I am overstepping the bounds between patient and nurse, but I have not been with you these few weeks without feeling that a new interest in life would be the best medicine that could be given you."
