Read the newspapers carefully, page by page. They are written and edited for you. Every item is selected by a trained man because it has an interest for you.

It tells in daily chapters of human progress, of science, invention, statecraft, government.

Read it with attention, thinking as you read, and it will enable you to talk ably and convincingly on all important topics.

The student of the newspaper is an educated man before he has studied them long, for they are a printed university, at a two-cent daily tuition, and have far broader and more comprehensive courses than any college can possibly have.

Do not be a headline reader. Do not skip from page to page, from column to column, so you may glean the news in a general way. Read your newspaper thoroughly and attentively. Read each article to the end. That will consume but little time, and after a week of such reading you will be amazed at the benefit you have derived.

No man, however rich, could afford to search for himself the information that the newspaper daily places before his eyes.

Business men depend on the newspaper. They are more of a business necessity than the telegraph or the telephone. They are also a necessity to you, whoever you may be. But unless you read them through and know what is in them you get only half the value out of them that you would otherwise gain.
