LOVE and MARRIED LIFE by the noted author Idah McGione Gibson

A GIFT FROM JOHN

I didn't waken until the next morning was well advanced. The knowledge of what was coming oppressed my first waking thought. There was such a difference in my feelings from those I had when I first found myself about to become a mother.

I felt then that the gates of heaven had opened, and I hardly dared look within for the brightness, the golden radiance seemed almost more than I could bear. And now, nothing but shadows, nothing but the blackness of despair, and in the background of my mind a feeling of sinfulness that I felt as I did about the coming of a child.

I tried to put the whole thing out of my mind, but it came with renewed intensity as Hannah brought in my breakfast and the usual box of gorgeous roses that John had sent me every day since he left.

"Shall I put the flowers in a vase, Katherine?" asked Hannah.

"Do just as you please, Hannah," I said dreadingly.

"Your room is so full of flowers now," she remarked.

"Yes, the fragrance of roses almost overpowers me."

Take Them to Church

"All right, honey, I'll tell you what we will do," said Hannah. "We'll just take these new ones and send them over to the church. They'll look lovely on the altar tomorrow morning. I'll have Miss Alice write a little note and say you are sending them in memory of your mother."

"That will be charming," I said heartily. "But first you must look in the box, John has been in the habit of sending me a note with them."

Hannah undid the wrappings and found the usual note inside. She handed it to me rather triumphantly. I was disinclined to open it before her, because in Hannah's eyes I was happily married; but she looked so expectant that I finally broke the seal.

"I bought the house yesterday, dearest and I am eagerly waiting for you to come and decorate and furnish it as you please. I had the deed made out in your name. Mother has made a great fuss and declares it is impossible for her to live alone, but I told her she hadn't been happy a minute since you came—at least she had made you unhappy by giving you to understand as much. And that now, when she had a chance to live in the old house for the rest of her life, she could make me think she was going to be miserable."

Can Not Keep Up Expenses

"She intimated that it would not be possible for her to keep up the expenses of the house, and I told her that I would do that. Every time I have been to our new house, Katherine, I like it better and better. We are going to be able to entertain a great deal. You know we have not had our friends about us often since we were married. But now we will show this old town just what real entertainment means."

"I am crazy to get it all fixed up. If you hadn't made such a fuss; my dear, at the way I had this house decorated and furnished, I could have come back. I am sure in my own mind that this would be much the best way, but for once I am going to give in to your ideas. I am not going to open my mouth about one thing, in or outside your house.

"How soon do you think you can have it furnished? I want to give a big party soon. Today's paper, which I am sending under separate cover, has a very splendid notice of my purchase of the house, and I hope you will be as pleased with your present as I am in giving it to you."

Isn't it a terrible thing, that we want and want things, and then just when we don't want them any more, they come to us. I had begged of John to have a little home for us, as I was not happy with his mother and he would not listen to me.

Fates Prove Contrary
I wanted my first baby, perhaps, more than anything else in the world, and fate took it from me, and now, when I want neither houses nor children, I am having both.

"Has Miss Alice gone out?" I asked Hannah. "Yes," she said. "I saw her going out just as I came upstairs."

"Was she walking or driving?"

"Driving," said Hannah. "At least, there was a taxi at the door."

"When she comes in will you ask her to come up to my room," I said. "For I had made my decision about John much as any other woman makes a decision, impulsively. I determined to write the whole thing to John, to do what he would call 'placing my cards on the table,' and let him decide."
