LOVE and MARRIED LIFE by the noted author, Idah McGione Gibson

My Baby. Charles told no one of the telegram from John, consequently the doctor, thinking John had not received the wire he saw me send, asked Hannah to telegraph again. "Mr. Goodwin," said Hannah afterwards, "insisted that the doctor write the telegram himself, or at least dictate it to be signed in his name. Then Mr. Charles took it to the telegraph office."

Exactly Like Him. It was exactly like John Gordon to think when he received my telegram that I was not really ill; that I had sent him the wire because, as he expressed it, "I wanted to make up." It was exactly like him to discount all that I implied in the telegram, describing it to himself as a woman's whim and start out of town without making definite plans so that a wire would reach him quickly in case of necessity. John's absolute coarseness and belief in himself and that the whole world must rally around him, is perhaps his greatest fault. His telegram brought consternation into the house where I was lying mercifully unconscious of it all. For the doctor at this time had despaired of my life and another telegram was sent to the office with this information. Hannah told me afterwards that Charles was like an insane man. "It was the first time," she said, "that I have ever seen Mr. Charles taken out of his calm, but he certainly did curse, and curse awfully. I almost believe that something terrible would have happened if Mr. Gordon had been able to make his appearance within the next twelve hours."

Too Weak to Speak. It was many hours before I awoke to consciousness. For a moment I had no feeling except the blessed realization of surcease from pain and then I raised my eyelids, and although I was too weak to ask the question the nurse understood, and with a smile she went to the door and brought to me my baby. Poets have lamented the inadequacy of words to describe the ecstasy of love's first kiss, and as I lay there too weak to move, too weak to even put my arm closer around the little bundle which the nurse had placed within my clasp, I knew that no word spoken by human tongue could express my emotion. Only a woman who has all the greatest of all thrills, when her first born is placed within her arms can know my feelings at this time. Well can it be said to be woman's crowning glory, and as I felt the warmth of the little body close to me and looked down into the tiny face I knew that at last I had come to realize what love meant. I closed my eyes again, for at the sight of my hands a little consternation crept into them.

"Isn't she sweet?" asked the nurse. I opened my eyes in surprise, and perhaps a little consternation crept into them.

Out of Her Thoughts. Until this moment I had not thought to ask whether my baby was a girl or a boy—and until this moment John had been absolutely out of my thoughts. My baby had usurped everything. It had been my world from which all else was shut out. But at hearing the pronoun "she" I visualized John looking down at us there—his mouth curled in that little crooked smile I had so often seen, his face half satirical, half contemptuous.

I could almost hear him say, "Oh, it's a girl, is it?" A little shudder ran from my head to my feet as I realized how keen would be his chagrin, and knew that he would feel that this would seem to be the climax of all the disappointments I had caused him. He would never for a moment remember that I was not to blame, and deep in his heart he would hold it against me and feel that in some way I had tried and succeeded in thwarting him in his ambitions for a son. JERSEY CLOTH FOR BLOUSES

Slip-Over With Peplum Said to Be Most Desirable.

Jersey cloth in silk, in one of the weaves that go by various names, is used increasingly for blouses. In spite of everything that has been predicted, the slip-over blouse with a peplum, is still the smartest vogue. To be sure, some of the very smart new blouses reach only to the waistline, but the peplum is the rule. And it is in these blouses that jersey in silk weaves is especially desirable. For it has body enough and at the same time suppleness enough to hang well around the hips. It is often elaborately embroidered, sometimes heavily, braided in soutache, sometimes worked in machine stitchery with colored wool in a way that adds distinction to many of the new blouses.
