LOVE and MARRIED LIFE

by the noted author
Idah McGlone Gibson

A Wife In Politics.
"You must forgive me, my dear Katharine, for writing at such length about politics," continued Alice's letter, "but I am so full of it I can think of nothing else."
"Tom thinks I am the smartest thing since I coined this epigram: The greatest menace to our country is the bad citizenship of its good citizens."

"Since then he has told all his friends that he expects me to run for Congress or something equally ridiculous. But truly I do think that every respectable and respecting woman should know something about the affairs of her country and should exercise her franchise if she has it. Why, do you know, my dear, for the first time, the other day, I learned if an American girl married a foreigner she lost her American citizenship and became a citizen of her husband's country. In this way a great many of our American girls who have married Germans lost all the money they had during the war. I think that thing should be remedied as soon as possible and I am going to try and remedy it I tell Tom. He asked me how I am going to do it and I have told him that we women of the voters' league are going to put up a plank of the kind to both parties and vote for the party that puts it in. Tom made a lot of fun of me and said, 'Don't you understand, Alice, that it doesn't do for a woman to become too earnest over anything, that having a pretty blonde in the gallery of the convention hall to wave the flag and rain down flowers on the heads of the delegates' is worth a dozen plain women on the floor with credentials?'"

"Oh dear, I suppose the time will never come, Katharine, while I am alive that men will ever consider us excepting for our beauty and youth. However, I was consoled enough to tell Tom that according to his own valuation I would probably get my way and what do you think he said, Katharine?"

"I think you are right, Alice, for you know you are the prettiest woman I ever saw and you grow better looking every day."

"Now wasn't that nice for plain old silent Tom, who rarely acts as if he saw me and who told me when he proposed that he did not believe in this passionate love, of which so many people were talking."

"I have come to the conclusion that our marriage was one of the happiest. We made no wild protestations to each other. I told Tom that I was not one of those women who have cold chills run down their backs the moment their lovers come into the room, and he said that he did not think he would like me if I did."

"He said he wanted a woman whom he could love, and respect to be the mother of his children."

"Poor Tom! He has not had those children that he wants so much, and that is one of the sweet things about him, Alice. He never says a word about it, although I know he is very disappointed that he have never had children and let me whisper it in your ear, dear, so am I. "Perhaps the good Lord will see fit to send me some in his own good time, but I wish he would hurry up."

"I am envying you every minute, my dear, for I know your baby is the sweetest thing in the world. Has she stretched her little toes and her mouth quirk up at the corner. Oh dear, I hope she won't have John's disposition."

"By the way, I have something funny to tell you. Elizabeth Moreland has found that her income does not stretch over the high cost of living. So she has decided to try and live with mother. I know it was she who made the decision, for poor old mother would never have thought of it. When John told me the other night that, after you moved, Elizabeth Moreland was going to live with mother, I laughed long and loud."

"Won't they have a cat and parrot time. John was very indignant when I suggested it to him."

"But you will know, my dear, how easy it is for Elizabeth Moreland to make John think the things she thinks." (To be Continued.)
