LOVE and MARRIED LIFE by the noted author Idah McGibson Gibson

Women—Old and New.
"I expect I am still old-fashioned enough," said John, "to think that the woman's place is in a house and that the minute she tries to get out of it, trouble begins for her as well as her husband, if she has one."
"Did you ever go into the old part of the cemetery, John, and look at the headstones; and then take a walk into the modern place where the dead lie and compare the headstones you see there with those you have just read?"
"No," said John, looking as though he thought I had gone suddenly mad. "What has that to do with what we are talking about?"
"Just this. When I was down in the country this summer, John, after my mother's death, I visited the cemetery very often; and one day I wandered over into the old part. You know those New England graveyards as they used to call them, are some of them a hundred years old. Wondering among the mounds one day, I was struck with the number of graves that surround the one that was marked with the man's name. The one would be 'Mary, Beloved Wife of John Smith, Aged 35' and 'Meditable, Beloved Wife of John Smith, Aged 38,' and perhaps even 'Martha, Beloved Wife of John Smith, Aged 43.' In every one of those plots of ground you found some tomb with four graves marked with the name of a woman who had died, before she was fifty. And beside them was always one man, who had lived to over. Personally, I think woman's advent into politics is a great mistake. What in the world a lot of old hens find to cackle about in the election of John Smith to the office of dog catcher, I never could tell."
"You'll find differently about it, John," I said somewhat flippantly, "when women decide that they do not like the way that John Smith performs the duties of his office as dog catcher and elect Mary Smith to do the work."
Even John laughed at this. (Copyright National Newspaper Service.)

TAKING CARE OF THE GIRLS BY THE REV. CHARLES STELZLE.

The other day, hundreds of "women of the streets" invaded the office of the leader of the "clean up the city" movement, and asked: "What is to become of us?"
They declared that they couldn't get jobs at a living wage, that most of them had children to support, and that their past would rise up against them if they tried to "live straight." However, these statements may be met in a purely academic discussion by people who have never been up against what these women are facing, there is something in their contention.
It's all right to say that they should never have gotten into this condition—they'll admit that you're right on this point—but there they are, and "What is to become of us?" they are now asking.
Nobody knows. Some of them will go to other cities which haven't yet closed their red-light districts or where such a thing is still tolerated.
A very few may go to the "homes for fallen women," where they'll be stared at and patronized by the dear folks who support such institutions.
A still smaller number may go back to their disreputable husbands, from whom they fled with their children in order to be free from an intolerable existence.
Some may again try "industrial life" in a shop or store, where they'll earn about enough to make them realize the utter impossibility of getting over the border line of respectability in surroundings, in physical comfort, in general culture, in social life; enjoying those refinements to which every woman is by nature entitled.
Possibly some will become housemaids and general servants—where they will work continuously for from 12 to 16 hours a day, sleep in unventilated little cobs, and be made to feel that they belong to an inferior order of human beings.
They may do any or all of these things, but they've already tried them all and failed. Indeed, in many cases these were the very conditions that drove them into the red-light district.
Some of them are "bad women." Some are "lazy." Some are "too fond of dress." Some "enjoy this life." Some are "weak-minded."
You're right. The fault isn't all on the side of society or the state. But, in the main, society is to blame. We are permitting economic conditions which literally compel women to "lead lives of shame." Women rarely receive a square deal in industry. They rarely receive the same wages that men receive for doing the same work.
We are tolerating conditions in the married relationship which are worse than unfair to women. And most of these conditions could be remedied by law—and by permitting women to vote.
And the outrageous situations many servant girls are compelled to put up with could also be remedied by law and by the voluntary action of the mistresses of homes in which servants are employed.
We are quite right in blaming these "women of the street," when they are wrong—but the rest of us have a distinct responsibility in getting industry, and the state—and principally ourselves—set right in this matter.
We have set up certain moral standards which we expect others to adhere to—even these women, who, we confess, are weaker than ourselves. There is nothing quite so un-human nature, which cannot be measured by the finest micrometer ever invented. They seek to classify human beings as the entomologist classifies his millions of bugs. By some how, their "subjects" or "cases" will not stay classified. They have a fashion of breaking out in the most unexpected manner, upsetting all the calculations of the sociologist.

The average working girl is very human. She can't help it; she was born that way, and since that time she has acquired a lot of the commodity which we know as "temperament." If this she isn't a bit different than the lady bountiful who is putting up the working girls' hotel, given the same chance to exercise her will with the exception that she isn't given the same chance to exercise it. Therefore, it might be a good plan to have the hotel promoter put herself in the place of the "problem" in interest she is building this enterprise. And when she does it might be a good thing to ask herself how she would like to be regarded as a "problem." There's something inspiring and ennobling in the thought, isn't there? To have other people hold meetings to dissect "one" and talk over how "one" is to be helped!

To be sure, plans must be talked about and the favored ones are to be heartily commended for their interest in those less fortunate than themselves, but if they do it in the spirit of patronage and paternalism and with the notion that they are dealing with creatures of a lower order, they may as well quit at once. The average working girl is too high-spirited to stand for such an attitude, and for that she is to be congratulated.
It would help mightily to have in charge of such a hotel a warmly sympathetic woman who knows life and its battles and who has regard mostly for general tendencies and not for the trifling things which are merely incidental. And may the Lord deliver us from the professionalism which kills so many otherwise splendid enterprises.
There must, of course, be due regard for the well-being of the girls who may live in the hotel, but the honor system is very much better than one which crowds out all naturalness and spontaneity. Fashionable folk must not conduct such affairs as mere fads. They should be started only after a careful investigation as to the real need for such enterprises, and all the factors should be carefully considered. And the human element is not the least of these.

Told in Twilight

Wednesday was a very gay day at the Yacht Club, many visitors being present both at the tea in the afternoon and the dance at night. The cool breeze from the water made the Clubhouse an ideal spot. "There is no place like Kingston, after all," said one lady, who has spent the last few years in many lands. The tea party who were in charge of the pretty table with its centre of bright zinnias, were Mrs. R. J. Carson, Mrs. G. A. Robinson, Mrs. J. Gurd, Mrs. Henry Wilkinson and Miss Sadie Brown. that the capacity of the Mill is being again increased and we are now able to supply those who have not been able to secure this high grade Flour, giving special attention to Central and Eastern Ontario. That was the object of building the Mill, which we have already increased greatly over our original intentions. This was made necessary owing to the great demand for this high grade Flour, all fresh Flour, no old stock Flour. Our special process enables us to make Flour of improved color and whiteness without removing the best part of the grain—all the old-time flavour of Mother's and Grandmother's Bread retained with all the modern color added. Thousands of bakers and householders are now certifying to the above and sending renewed orders.
It's the flavour does it.
