CHEWING GUM

In the course of a day's travel in some fairly well populated district one runs across many men and women who are prematurely gray in regards to hair. The causes of this condition are many and varied. Sometimes they are the fault of the victim himself, sometimes they are not. The grayness may have been brought about by overwork, it may have cropped out naturally as a family trait, perhaps it is the result of long cause. There is, however, one man in every fifty who are prematurely gray, who can blame his silvery locks on Chewing gum as a confection is fairly good; chewing gum as a pastime can be tolerated; but chewing gum as an accompaniment to the orchestra at the theatre is one of the curses of modern times. Perhaps the meaning is not quite clear. In order to get it clear it is only necessary to visit any movie emporium three times. You are sure to find out what it is in that number of visits and in nine cases out of ten you will discover it the first time.

The gum chewer starts out when the lights have been turned low, moving his jaws slowly and quietly in fiendish anticipation of the discomfort which he is about to cause later on. The first few scenes of the photoplay pass off without much happening except a few appreciative cracks from the abuser of good chewing gum. The first exciting or comic happening in the piece is a signal for a volley of smacks, sucks, spasms of blowing and snorts. That is only a preparatory exercise for the real thing. When the action of the picture starts out in real earnest then it is that the hair of any man in the neighborhood of the gum chewer with a fairly decent sense of nerves begins to take on its lighter hue. His ears are delighted by a sound like many porkers working strenuously at a trough in the pursuit of satisfaction for their inner demands. Cracks like pistol shots mingle with this delightful melody and the whole is usually the scenes being presented on the In many cases the victim leaves the theatre, never to return. He goes to his home a nervous breakdown, sadly looks at his gray locks, turned to that color in an hour, and makes a solemn vow to himself that he will join the Society for the Prohibition of everything.
