LEADING MOVIE MAN VISITING KINGSTON

William Colvin Thinks That Kingston Presents a Wonderful Field.

William Colvin, personal representative of Ernest Shipman, president Dominion Films Company, New York, is in the city, visiting his sister, Mrs. William C. Dawson, 250 University avenue. Mr. Colvin was the business manager in the production of such great Canadian successes as "Back to God's Country," by James Oliver Curwood. He played leading heavies in Ralph Connor's stories "The Foreigner," and "Cameron of the Royal Mounted." Mr. Colvin is of the opinion that the surface has not yet been even scratched respecting the possibilities of pictures in Canada. There is a field of romance and action in Canadian history that will eventually be properly developed. Right here in Kingston is a wonderful field from the view point of the film producers that ought to be developed.

Both "Royal" and "Ancient." While the Duke of York, afterwards James II., was in residence at Holyrood, a discussion arose between him and two English noblemen of his suite as to whether golf had not been played as long in England as in Scotland. James championed the claims of Scotland, and quoted acts of the Scottish Parliament of 1457 with reference to the game. Similar evidence of antiquity not being forthcoming for England, they proposed to decide it by playing a game on Leith Links for stakes—James selected as his partner for Scotland the best golfer of his day, and the descendant of a long line of golfers, named James Paterson, a shoemaker in Edinburgh. The game resulted in a win for James and his cobbler. The stakes were handed to Paterson, with which he built a house in the Canongate, Edinburgh—still standing, and known as the Golfers' Land. He placed a tablet on the front of it bearing the Paterson arms with the crest of a hand holding a golf club, and the motto, "Far and Sure."

GERMAN PEOPLE THE SAME

Dr. Richard Grelling (author of "J'accuse") in January, Yale Review.

To understand rightly the character of a man or of a state, one must first understand its origin.

The German republic did not grow out of the feeling that conditions under the Hohenzollerns were intolerable; nor out of the lack of civil freedom, which, in spite of an apparently democratic franchise, stamped the German people as a parish among the nations of Western Europe.

Nor was it the result of the traditional arrogance of a ruling caste made up of junkers and army officers, who had, time out of mind, divided among themselves all the civil and military offices leading to preferment, and who knew how to turn to the advantage of their own pockets the tax laws and the tariff.

The birth of the republic was not due to the encroachments of an army which regarded itself as a state within a state, and which lived according to its own penal laws and its own code of honor; nor, again, was it due to the gigantic crime of a half-demanded sovereign, who carried away by dreams of world power, and spurred by ambition and earth hunger, brought about a world catastrophe—a catastrophe which he could have averted with a wave of his hand or a single word.

It was not the slave chains which the German people had worn in times of peace, nor the moral stigma or the material suffering which the war had brought upon them, that caused the revolution and the creation of the republic. No, it was defeat and defeat alone that broke the power of the criminal war-makers—the terrible, crushing defeat which in three short months from July to October, 1918, transformed a ruler drunk with victory into a deserter fleeing from his own country; and transformed his generals, carried away by success as they had been, into cowards and beaten applicants for a cessation of hostilities.

How, How! "How do you know that you can support my daughter?" asked the Stern Parent.

"How do I know?" demanded the Sutor, who was asking for her hand. "Huh! Haven't I been holding her on my knees every night for the last six months?"

"Well," replied the Young Man, "if she has that kind of a nose I don't want her."

Friends. A friend's a mighty useful scout, If he is not abused; And you must not let him find out That he is being used.

Too Much Money. Charles B. Cochran, upon his return to England, told English sporting writers that, although the articles of agreement between Dempsey and Carpentier barred Europe as a site of the heavyweight titular boxing contest, he was hopeful that the bout might be held in England. He believes it would draw $1,000,000 in London.

"I should be very sorry to see £250,000 of good English money thrown away on any boxing contest," says a prominent London writer on sports. "In this particular case a large pocket of the proceeds would go across the Atlantic, and in any event huge sums are to be paid to the actual principals, who would be more than adequately remunerated if they received a title of the sums laid down as their shares by the sales articles. These preposterous purses are the bane of boxing as a British sport, and the sooner they are ridiculed out of existence the better for the public and the rank and file of the boxing profession."

Havana's Magnificent Clubhouse. The clubhouse at Oriental Park race course at Havana, which will be formally opened on Christmas Day, is one of the finest on any course in the world, which is saying a good deal, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that the massive structure, strikingly picturesque and architecturally perfect. On the lower floor are the billiard parlors, men's cafe and club members' bar. The next floor is given over to a spacious dining hall and ladies' lounging room, while the floor over that contains eight suites, modern and up-to-date in every respect, comprising sitting-room, bedroom and tiled bathroom. On the top story is the roof garden, and it is here that the club members and their friends will congregate after the races every evening to spend a few hours.

More Trouble. The chorus girls in the National Opera House in Paris have gone on strike. They demand more money for playing parts in Salome, in which they have to use blue dye because the blue is hard to wash off. They demand more money for acting as angels dangling at the ends of wires. And they demand more money when they have to play the parts of courtesans on the stage, as this infringes on their dignity as women.

THE POLITICIAN'S FLIGHT A. Maurice Low in January Yale Review. Politicians who met in 1920 to frame platforms and nominate candidates had no longer to cater to the saloon but they had to defer to the women. It was a new condition requiring new methods. A "deal" with liquor was not always possible, but it was always simple. It was, to speak bluntly, a mere matter of price. Liquor had a pocket nerve, but woman has a heart. Liquor had an appetite, but woman has a moral sense. Liquor had no sentiment but self-interest; woman—poor creature that she is!—is dominated by sentiment which engulfs her self-interest. The politician who in the past had successfully "handled" liquor, who knew how to approach it, what argument to use and what terms to exact or bargain for, found himself an amateur playing a new game when he approached woman. His training went for naught. He couldn't slap a woman—often daintily and exquisitely dressed—on the shoulder and "jolly" her with a cigar, or effusively offer to take her to see the boss, or with a wink suggest that the lid was coming off and there would be a continuous roll of smirched dollars across the polished bar. He was clumsily gallant, effusively complimentary, too recently dressed in his morality—a coat so newly donned that the creases were still there—to be convincing or to inspire sincerity.

Free Medical Advice. Q.—Dear Doc: After imbibing freely of Home Brew and Raisin Jack, I have been troubled with pink elephants that get in my bedrooms and growl at me. Is this a serious matter, and what should I do? R. U. M. A.—You have no cause for alarm. Pink elephants that growl are plentiful nowadays in the homes of those who brew their own. But if the pink elephants should happen to enter your bedroom when they are wearing green plug hats, your condition is serious, and you had better call in a physician at once.
