A LINE WITH DICKENS.

Police Court Figured In Oliver

An almost forgotten link with Dickens is in danger of passing into total obscurity.

At numbers 52 and 53 Hatton Garden, the home of diamond merchants, is to be seen above an oldfashioned doorway a coat of arms in stone, and one feels the Dickens atmosphere the moment the threshold is crossed. This is one of the entrances to the old Hatton Garden police court, where Oliver Twist was charged with stealing a handkerchief from Mr. Brownlow.

The fact that these buildings were once a "lock-up" and are a link with Dickens does not appear to be generally known among the business people who now have their offices in them. The housekeeper told an interviewer that she knew the place was once a lock-up, that it had a history, and that Dickens had written about it, but beyond that she could trace nothing. The wide staircase with carved banisters remains, and the hall and landings give one the impression that this part has changed little since Dickens' time. At the rear, in Hatton Yard, were the jailers' quarters, where the male prisoners used to march off in single file to old Coldbath Fields Prison.

Mr. Maurice Murphy, of King's Cross Road, Clerkenwell, whose uncle was a jailor here, says:

"On each prisoner's right wrist was fixed a handcuff with a hole, through first man to the last, and padlocked have been visiting the latter's par- criticism of her published memoirs. at both ends, so that if one or two wanted to escape, they would have to take the whole crowd with them. The route taken was through Great Saffron Hill, up Pickled-Leg Walk (now Crawford Passage), through Coldbath Square, and straight into the gates of Coldbath Fields Prison. The last magistrate was Mr. Laing, referred to by Dickens in 'Oliver Twist' as Mr. Fang."

The police court was eventually removed to King's Cross Road, and is now the Clerkenwell police court. In they will reside. the garden next to the old lock-up is the last remaining green patch of the original Hatton Garden. Every other back garden on the estate has been built upon, and this, too, will apparently go the way of the other back gardens when the lease expires.

Beer Brewed In Abbey.

Westminster Abbey has been put to many strange uses during the thousand years or so of its existence. In Cromwell's time it was turned into a barracks. In pre-Reformation days it was utilized as a Parliament house, and a brewery and a bakery were established by the monks for their convenience within the sacred precincts.

In the early years of the last century it occupied in popular estimation the place now taken by Madame Tussard's, a visit to the "Abbey Waxworks," as the collection of effigies of famous people there kept was called, being one of the treats reserved for country cousins and children on their holiday.

Here, too, William Caxton set up the first printing-press. And because it was his custom to discuss all matters connected with the undertaking at a meeting in the abbey chapel with the Father Superior in the chair, any organised gathering of workers in a printing establishment to-day is a "chapel," and its chosen chairman is a "father."

Sir William Watson's Famous Poem Recalled.

The storm which has raged in England about "Margot's Memoirs" will get added fillip with the announcement that Sir William Watson is prepared to sell to the highest bidder the original manuscript of his poem "The Woman With the Serpent's Tongue." This poem was published in 1909 and then it was generally asserted that it had been inspired by Mrs. Herbert H. Asquith, then presiding at 10 Downing Street, and Sir William has never denied the report in a manner to silence effectively persons who connected her with such

He said it was written on ordinary copy paper in his own handwriting and that it is in thirty lines, with all the emendations and corrections just as it went to the printer.

Irrespective of the author's silence regarding the inspiration of the poem, reports that Mrs. Asquith was this inspiration cannot help but be recalled in the face of the aptness Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Spicer, who of many of the lines to the present

At the time the poem was first published, Mrs. Asquith was both shocking and charming London with the gayety of her entertainments in her official residence and the flightiness on her part at entertainments elsewhere.

There have just been published the gossipy letter of one of her men contemporaries in that circle called "The Souls," in which he describes the "first lady in the land" dropping her skirts and dancing in her petticoats a pas seul before a dinner party.

Good-looking Heroines.

"George Eliot sometimes wrote as if jealous of the good looks with which she had herself endowed her characters, Mrs. Ward as if readers would never visualize hers as goodlooking enough without perpetual reminders," says Mr. Howland Grey in the Fortnightly Review.
