JOSSELYN'S

By Kathleen Norris Author of "The Heart of Rachael." "Martie, the Unconquered," "The Story of Julia Page," "Mcther." etc.

But at this memory the thick tears would blind Ellen's eyes. She had mourned her baby, her delicate, wistful little Rose, but she looked back at that sorrow now as something sacred, something precious, something that had bound Gibbs and herself together more strongly than joy.

She would go into the nursery at "Villino dell' Orto" and begin to busy herself about Tommy's little person. Was he going to bed? Let Mother undress him. she would fall into deep musing over the little buttons and straps.

"I can undress myself, Moth'!" Tommy would protest, wriggling. She would catch the warm, hard little face to hers in a hunger of love. Perhaps the child would glance at her in surprise.

"Indeed, I don't know, Tom!" this summer. Not that Ellen and Gibbs, as normal young persons, had space, ran from top to top of doornot quarrelled before. quarter of eight," she answered lightly. She scored here, for Lillian had had friends for a later dinner the day before and had captured Tommy, and made him bring down his violin. The child had been reluctant to play the simple little airs he knew, and Gibbs' paternal authority had been needed, and the threat of a whipping. Ellen had been excruciatingly uncomfortable during this scene, and had presently escaped with Tommy upstairs, almost as near tears as the
