Diary of a Fashion Model

By GRACE THORNCIAFFE

for Saturday—diary of a fashion model. She Chats About the Union of Contrasting Fabrics in Novel Spring Frocks.

Yesterday it rained so hard I thought we'd have a rather quiet afternoon. But about 3 o'clock in came Miss Amelie Lodge, whose engagement, recently announced, has caused quite a flutter in fashionable circles.

"I'd like to see some pretty frocks for daytime wear," she announced as Madame met her. "Very well," replied Madame.

"We have some charming things I'm sure you'll like. Have you any particular color or fabric in mind?"

"No," she answered, "except I want something I can wear outdoors or in on springtime days."

"Then suppose I show you a dress of taffeta and swiss," said Madame. She beckoned me toward her and directed me to slip on a model we had finished that morning.

"Are these 'half-and-half' dresses, as I call them, fashionable?" asked Miss Lodge.

"They certainly are, while the suit made of contrasting materials is also approved by discriminating women," was Madame's response.

Just then I appeared on the platform, and Miss Lodge exclaimed: "What a lovely frock!"

"I thought it would appeal to you, as green looks so well with your hair," answered Madame.

"Do come nearer and let me see it," said Miss Lodge, as I walked across the platform.

"The green swiss is embroidered in white, which is rather summery in effect," commented Madame as I walked toward Miss Lodge.

"What a clever arrangement!" she declared, as she noted the upstanding fold of swiss which marked the junction of the silk and cotton materials.

"There is another interesting feature in the binding of green taffeta which outlines the neckline and short sleeves," remarked Madame, as I turned around.

"Yes, that gives it a dainty touch. What a lovely ribbon you have used for the belt," said Miss Lodge, as she scrutinized the dress.

"The silver is good-looking and always lends a certain air of richness. Did you notice the deep green which runs through the middle and maintains the color so well?" questioned Madame.

"Yes, that's one thing I like about your creations—the details are perfect," said Miss Lodge.

"They must be," answered Madame. "If they were not I should be a most unhappy woman, for therein lies my art."

"Ah!" exclaimed Miss Lodge, as I turned around to give her an opportunity to see the back of the dress. "here's another of those touches you delight in! Who would have thought of putting garlands of flowers on the back of the dress?"

"Well, at present, the back of the gown is getting a great deal of attention, and so, when I held some roses against the dress I decided to put them on. It gives it an air of individuality," was Madame's reply.

"What are those roses made of?" asked Miss Lodge.

"White organdie," replied Madame.

"How dainty! In fact, I'm so charmed with this frock you needn't show me any others. This one is just exactly what I want," declared Miss Lodge.

Good Night Stories

By Black Swan

Doty Visits the Garden of the Sea.

Doty stood for a long time looking at the waves softly lapping the sandy shore. It gave her a lonesome, sad feeling, and she wondered how the little fish and creatures of the ocean could stand living all their lives under the water.

"Wonder if they ever wish they could visit our land," she mused out loud, when a faint laugh startled her, and Happy Giggles, the elfin from Makobelle's Land, tumbled out of a sand pile Doty had been making.

"That's a funny thing to be wondering about," laughed the little elfin. "Why should they grow tired of their homes?"

"It must be so dreary and lonesome under there," replied Doty, shaking hands with the little elfin. "I've often wondered what it looks like. My Daddy knows something about it, because he can swim under water, but—"

Happy Giggles interrupted her with a merry laugh, and taking his magic feather from his cap he waved it in the air three times and whistled.

"A lazy-looking crab backed out of the water and slowly crept across the sand to his side.

"At your service," said the crab in a sober voice.

Happy Giggles waved his magic feather over Doty's head and they both climbed upon the lazy crab's back, and he slowly crept back into the water. Doty jumped when the water first struck her face, but Happy Giggles' magic spell soon made her feel as if she had been used to living under the water all her life.

The rocks seemed covered with living things. Gay-colored sea flowers, which Happy Giggles called anemones, nodded her a welcome.

"Every beautiful flower you see has some way of protecting itself from its enemies," said Happy Giggles as they stopped in front of a beautiful sea anemone. "This little sea flower, which really should be called an animal, has poisoned darts concealed under its feelers. If they catch hold of a crab he soon feels the pain."

"He certainly does," laughed Mr. Crab. "And a sharp jab from these feelers will make a fish faint. But, dear me, I've made it a point to be kind to them and they never bother me. I've carried the sea anemones around on my back many a time. A big fish gobbled up the last one I carried before I had a chance to save it. You see, they need their poisoned darts for protection."

Fish of every color and size darted among the beautiful pink and red corals. They seemed happy and gay, and often stopped to pull playfully at the sea-weeds and the tall grasses which swayed back and forth with the waves.

Doty wanted to pick a cluster of feathery, star-shaped flowers, but Mr. Crab told her not to.

"They do look like flowers," he laughed, "but they are Mrs. Starfish's children. They spend the early part of their lives on stems like that. When they are old enough they go to the bottom of the sea and become full-grown starfish."

"My goodness!" laughed Doty. "I thought living under the sea would be such a lonesome life. It's just filled with wonderful things, isn't it? But I suppose if you folks had a chance to visit our land you would think it funny, too, wouldn't you?"

There was a terrible rush of water above Doty's head, and Mr. Crab, forgetting his guests seated on his back, backed under a stone and Doty tumbled down, down, down. And when she opened her eyes she found herself sitting on the shore.

"He lives in the past."

"Does he never take any interest in affairs of the present?"

"Not unless it's forced upon him but I've seen an irate traffic policeman awaken him to the stern realities of modern life."

Keep Out the Flood of Foreign "Booze"

Customs Statement

Liquor imported into Canada from abroad for consumption in Ontario.

1920	- 338,539	- -	2,120,546
Increase	- 213,867 Gals.		$1,569,752

"BOOTLEGGERS," "Rum Runners," "Whiskey Smugglers" and "Blind Pigs" are demoralizing the community, selling imported liquors contrary to law.

Drunkenness is increasing, and also the crimes and offences which go hand in hand with drunkenness.

Drinking in the home threatens to take the place of drinking at the bar.

Importation Must Cease

The Ontario Temperance Act is becoming increasingly difficult to enforce because of the flood of imported liquor coming in from other provinces and from abroad.

In 1920 the traffic in liquor imported from outside Canada increased 285% over 1919, while liquor poured in from other provinces literally by the car load.

This situation is directly due to the repeal of the war-time Order-in-Council which, when in force, prohibited importation.

This Referendum is to prohibit importation permanently.

Premier Drury himself says: "I shudder to think of the condition in which we would find ourselves if we lost. If this Referendum fails we would be confronted for a time with this unenforceable law."

This Referendum must not fail.
