Told in the Twilight

On Wednesday afternoon and evening crowds of visitors filled Mr. and Mrs. Abraham Shaw's flower decked rooms, glad of this opportunity of congratulating them upon the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage, and wishing them many more happy years. Mr. and Mrs. Shaw received in the drawing room, where golden tulips in tall crystal vases and big bowls suggested the golden wedding day. Miss E. Pannell, who was Mrs. Shaw's bridesmaid fifty years ago, received with her sister, and the visitors also had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. C. Briggs, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Shaw, Dr. and Mrs. A. Shaw, Philadelphia, and Mr. and Mrs. Robert Shaw, Ottawa. Mrs. W. M. Campbell and Miss H. L. Chown were also in the drawing room and directed the visitors to the tea room, all gold and white, golden tulips on the sideboard and about the room. The table centred with a huge wedding cake set in billowy white tulle and crowned with Ophelia roses in a slender crystal vase. Daffodils caught the tulle in place. More roses were in four small vases and wedding cake and bride's cake were in the frilly golden baskets with their handles twined with fern and daffodils; yellow candles shed their soft light, and overhead was a golden shade, giving the last artistic touch. Here Mrs. W. T. G. Brown poured coffee from a big silver urn, and Mrs. George E. Lee was in charge of the silver tea service. Mrs. W. Skinner cut the gold and white ices at the table with its bowl of daffodils, and the assistants were Mrs. M. S. Richmond, Mrs. W. H. Dalby, Mrs. G. R. Weikel (Philadelphia), Miss A. S. Asseltine and Miss E. A. Driver. During the evening a deputation from the board of Sydenham Street Methodist church came up and an appreciative address was read by W. J. Crothers to Mr. Shaw. A deputation from the Sunday school followed also, with an address to Mrs. Shaw, conveying their good wishes and congratulations, which was read by E. P. Jenkins.

Diary of a Fashion Model

By GRACE THORNCLIFFE

She Describes a Novel and Attractive Trimming on a Daytime Dress. There are many different places to which I resort in quest of new ideas. The other day I was lunching at a smart restaurant when I saw the frock which is illustrated. Pam and I had just given our order and were glancing at the interesting persons, when she suddenly said: "There's a stunning frock!" "Where?" I inquired, as I hurriedly looked about. "Two tables away from us," replied Pam, indicating the direction with a glance. "That is striking," I answered, as I noticed a tall girl standing beside the table. "I wonder what it's made of," said Pam. "Oh, I should say the dress is cut from tan gabardine or one of those twilled wool fabrics which are so fashionable," I replied as I noted the long, straight lines of the frock. "I think that navy blue apron is lovely," remarked Pam, as the girl walked toward us. "Now we'll see exactly what the material is," I announced, as Pam turned around so she could get a better view of the frock in question. "It's gabardine, all right," said Pam, after the girl passed. "How stunning it looks with the navy blue satin apron!" "It does, indeed, and the deep cuffs of blue satin are also most effective," I rejoined. "Are apron effects in good style?" queried Pam. "Yes, they are often used to adorn a frock, not only on the strictly tailored model, but also on the fluffy type of dress. In fact, on the latter types I think they are especially attractive. The lace, flimsy materials lend themselves so well to this mode of decoration," I answered. "How did you like those bows on the sides?" asked Pam. "Very much, and they're made of beautiful satin ribbon," I replied. "The trimming is rather unusual," Pam remarked as the girl disappeared.

"It is, but don't you think it's effective?" I questioned. "Yes," she answered, "but it's not a braid, is it?" "Oh, no! It's merely a few threads of blue silk laid on closely together and held down in the middle by a thread of gold," I replied. "I really wonder who thinks up all the different ways of adorning which make the spring clothes so pretty this season," mused Pam as she toyed with her ring. "Why, there are people who devote all their time in designing such novelties. And individual creators frequently originate some startling trimming idea," I answered.

"I wonder why there was no embroidery around the neckline," continued Pam. "That dress didn't need any, for if you remember, it had a band of blue around the neckline, and the unadorned neckline is frequently preferred to the elaborately trimmed one," I said. "Well, I certainly think the dress was extremely smart. How did you like the hat?" asked Pam. "Very much. The fabric hat is really awfully good this season. Of course many good looking straw hats are worn, yet they only emphasize the good style of the fabric hat," I remarked as the waiter appeared with our order.
