 France Has Marriage Mari

A story is going the rounds of the American press that the marriage market is being revived in certain parts of France, particularly in Poitou and Vendee. The war left France TWO MUSK OX ROBES IN PRIME with many hundreds of thousands of odd women, who in the ordinary course of events could hardly be exsee Geo. Palmer, cor. Usually they are held on the regular weekly market day, but sometimes there are special markets with nothing on exhibition but the girls and their admirers. The idea was promoted, we suppose, partly for the purpose of attracting young men from a distance to the markets. It might be supposed that the young men in any particular neighborhood sented. Office 95 Clarence street, would have plenty of opportunities of meeting the young ladies in the same parish and forming their own opinions as to their value as wives. The marriage market gives the same opportunity to young men from other parishes. They have also the advaninvestment bonds for sale; deposits display themselves at the market are C. It must often happen that for many reasons a girl would not make such a strong appeal to the young men with whom she has grown up as to a stranger who sees her for the first time. The girls are selected for the market by men who are supposed to be good judges of looks and who understand thoroughly the sort of wife a young Frenchman should have. These experts travel about the country at whose instance is not explained - and make a list of all the marriageable girls in the neighborhood. These are classified according to age, and looks, and build, and their various qualifications are noted. These items are set down on a card, which is supplied each girl, and she is invited to present herself at the next market, where a special place is reserved for the contestants. Each girl comes provided with a large red parasol, which advertises her quest, besides offering her protection against sun and rain. It also serves the purpose of a small tent when a prospective husband wishes to make an examination at close quarters, and even, as we are told, help, himself to

For a casual kiss the girl merely lowers her parasol to fend off the eyes of the curious, but when the investigator desires to refresh himself more copiously, she turns her back upon the spectators and holds the parasol in such a way that both are shut off from public view. This gesture with the parasol is and the girl are strongly attracted and that a marriage is likely to re-At the close of the market there is a general jollification, and many of the girls walk off with their new friends to complete the plans for their marriage. It is usual, we are told, for a girl to receive at least one offer of marriage in the course of a single fair, and the more attractive, as a rule, receive several. When a girl attends several fairs without being appropriated, it is almost certain that she has unusually high standards, rather than that she is 2-4 singularly barren of attractions. Those who think that this roughand-ready sort of courtship is not likely to lead to happy and permanent marriage ties are refuted by statistics collected in the districts where it is popular, which show that there are fewer divorces and fewer illegitimate children than elsewhere. It is also noted that the birth rates in these districts are greater than elsewhere, which is a matter of prime importance to the Government of France. On this account the Government is said to watching the experiments with keen interest. It is also promoting beauty contests with the hope of increasing the marriage rate, although one quire would think that a girl pretty enough to win one of these contests, Campbell's experiences in one of them, would not lack for displays a specialty, by Shaw at 213 admirers in her own neighborhood.
