THE FATE OF KINGS.

Charles of Austria-Hungary that turmoil with which Europe is still resounding it has become an evil day for kings.

Strangely enough, however, it were once his subjects, as well as others versed in the lore of kingship. that when an individual has once been king he always retains a sort of kingly taint. He must even as private citizen be treated as a king. Hence by common consent Charles of the House of Hapsburg is to be treated as other kings and emperors have been treated when they had outlived their usefulness. He has been banished. And so in years to come when schoolboy students of history recite the long list of kings and potentates who ended their declining days in exile, they will conclude the list by addiag: "And also Emperor Charles of Austria-Hungary who was banish-

PROBLEMS OF THE JOBLESS.

Those who have never been out of a job, without money and without friends to whom appeal may be made, cannot appreciate the position in which many thousands of able-bodied men now, find themselves. It has been said that the best recipe for getting a job is to have one. A man who has work finds it easier to get other work, is another way of stating the idea. Perhaps this explains why it is so difficult for the jobless to get placed again. When places are so scarce there is difficulty in locating a prospect.
