MARTINS BATTLE SPARROWS. St. Mary's and Dundas Boast Bird That Does No Harm.

Shall the purple martins or the sparrows hold the mastery of the air in Ontario? Everybody knows how the sparrow drives away the birds that would destroy insects. It is not so well known that the purple martin exercises control over noxious insect life wherever they go. And what is more important, they can battle the sparrows.

Two Ontario towns, St. Mary's and Dundas, have five colonies of purple martins, mainly because of the fact that for generations residents have provided good nesting places for the birds. In Dundas a Mr. Isaac Lathrop, coming from Pennsylvania in 1835, set up a many-chambered bird house on a pole. Perhaps the birds followed him across the border. They have been coming every year since. When they came, one spring the house was gone, but another nesting place was hastily rigged up, and they have stayed.

In St. Mary's there are convenient holes in the wooden trimmings of the stone buildings along Water street, and here every spring the purple martins come. Perhaps it may have been accidental that apertures were left by careless builders at certain houses and store fronts and that the birds have taken advantage of this circumstance. May some golden-throated purple martin twitter and chortle for him all his work days, and may a late lark sing for him at the sunset of life, writes A. C. Wood.

In St. Mary's they do battle with the English sparrows and drive them away. The people realize that the martin lives on flies and gnats, and is a blessing, simply ignoring berries and grains. The bird is said to winter in the far southern states. When will other towns encourage the better bird and discourage the peaky sparrow?

Vancouver Saw Virgin Sea. George Vancouver, who was born in 1758, entered the British navy at the early age of 13 and later accompanied Captain Cook on his second and third voyages of discovery. After serving several years in the West Indies, Vancouver was given the command of an expedition to the north-west coast of America, the objects of which were to take over from the Spaniards territory they had seized in that region; to explore the coast; to search for a northern passage to the Great Lakes; and to ascertain the true character of Juan de Fuca Strait.

The expedition consisted of two ships, the "Discovery," of which Vancouver was in command, and the "Chatham," under the command of Lieutenant Broughton. They sailed from Falmouth on April 1, 1781, to Australia, via the Cape of Good Hope, and thence to New Zealand, Tahiti and the Hawaiian Islands. Vancouver was the first properly to explore the coast of New Zealand.

It was not until April 13, 1792, that Vancouver first sighted the west coast of North America. He carefully surveyed the coast and inlets of what is now known as British Columbia, and which was named after him. Vancouver was not, however, the actual discoverer of the island, it having been discovered in 1492 by Juan de Fuca.

Vancouver again visited the Pacific coast in 1791 and again in 1794, when he sailed as far north as Cook's Inlet, Alaska. After this voyage, Vancouver returned to England via Cape Horn and arrived in the latter part of 1795. Immediately on his return he commenced a narrative of his voyages and although he worked on it until within a few weeks of his death, he was not able to complete it. He died at Peterhead in 1798 at the early age of 40. His brother John, assisted by Captain Poyet (who sailed with Vancouver on his expedition), completed the record, which was published in 1798.

In These Tough Times. A big manufacturer discovered that a certain man had been representing himself as an agent for his firm, and had been doing twice as much business as any of the real agents. He informed the police. "I want this man collared as soon as possible," said he. "We'll have him under lock and key in a day or two," answered the detective. "Good heavens, man," shouted the manufacturer, "I don't want to imprison him. I want to entice him."

A Clever Design. An added attraction to George Masoud's window on Princess street is a handsome miniature lighthouse, which, when illuminated at night, catches the eye and demands the admiration of the passer-by. It was constructed by Bert Rogerson, 78 Division street, a fourteen-year-old student at the college institute from model builder materials. All the work, including the electrical wiring was done by the boy himself, and he has produced a clever piece of work.
