British Woven Brocade For Royal Wedding Gown

London, Dec. 13.—Lining up with the spirit of the hour, Princess Mary has accepted an offer of bridal lingerie to be fashioned by a score of Irish peasant girls, picked needle workers, who will design the regal dainties with the shamrock interwoven. The material will be the finest Irish linen and will be delivered by the Royal Irish Industries Association. There will be six pieces of such article in the set of lingerie which will be produced under the finest possible workmanship with real lace placed around the necks and sleeves of the garments.

Shamrocks will be used in the lace on some of her gowns, with shoulder straps of white ribbon. In fact, all the garments will be white, with pale blue trimmings.

Princess Mary will also have white knitted frocks made by the girls of Donegal, which is the home of hand knitting. These girl workers cure fish in the fishing season and knit at other times. The Princess plans to wear knitted frocks on her honeymoon abroad. These will be made of the finest wool in white, with a plain bodice and short sleeves and a deep flounce for the skirt. For travelling she plans to wear Irish tweed suits.

The wedding gown itself will be made by a London man dressmaker, who has made royal bridal gowns before. The designs for the gown have not yet been decided upon, but probably will follow the precedent set by many other royal brides and will be of hand woven brocade, with a design symbolizing the British Isles. It is estimated that ten weeks will be necessary for the designing and weaving of the fabric and the preparation of looms for the special design. Former soldiers now working at the looms will be entrusted with part of the work.

Ignorance is bliss, all right. The man who never learns his own faults never has to worry over them.
