PROF. MITCHELL SPEAKS INCIDENTS OF THE DAY

To R.M.C. Cadets About Julius Caesar and Field Service Regulations.

Professor G. W. Mitchell, Queen's University, gave a splendid address to the cadets of the Royal Military College on Wednesday afternoon, this being the fourth of the series of lectures in the Sir Arthur Currie Hall. After being introduced by Major-General Sir A. C. Macdonell, the speaker told his audience that he had had great difficulty in selecting a suitable topic, as he understood that the subject must be about happiness, about which the only thing he knew was that one should mind his own business. Prof. Mitchell expressed pride at being asked to visit the college and address the cadets and spoke of the beauty of the buildings and the surrounding scenery. He also suggested that the cadets should feel privileged to study and work amidst such environments.

When Prof. Mitchell announced that the title of his address was to be "Julius Caesar and the Field Service Regulations," he was greeted with roars of merriment, and the attention of the audience was immediately caught. Continuing, the speaker showed conclusively that the battle of Pharsalia, fought in the year 48 B.C., was won by Julius Caesar simply because he followed the principles which are now enunciated in the Field Service Regulations of the British Army.

The speaker made several references to the writings and speeches of Julius Caesar, comparing them with paragraphs of the present text-books of the British army, and displayed a splendid knowledge of both ancient history and modern tactics.

The Battle of Pharsalia decided who was to be the master of the civilized world, Pompey, who was the leader of the aristocratic element, or Julius Caesar, who represented the democrats, and was typical of the age long struggle between the East and West for supremacy.

Another important feature of the battle was that it was won entirely by tactics, being won by Caesar with 20,000 infantry and 1,000 cavalry against his opponent's 45,000 infantry and 7,000 cavalry.

Professor Mitchell showed how Pompey violated the Field Service Regulations by deploying too soon and in full sight of the enemy, and how Caesar by originating the principles which are now laid down in the text-books, and forming front lines, supports and a large reserve fought a successful strategic battle.

"And now," said the speaker, "just to show that I am not talking nonsense, let us turn to Field Regulations, Part I, Section 102, Infantry Training, Section 174, para 5, and compare the paragraphs with extracts from the life of Caesar." The learned educationalist had the text-books at hand and proceeded to compare the principles laid down by Caesar with the present regulations to the astonishment of all present.

Professor Mitchell then explained the tactics followed by Caesar after the battle and rout of Pompey's forces, when the forces of the latter were surrounded, ultimately surrendering to Caesar when they even then numbered 22,000 troops, as compared with the 21,000 troops with which the military genius had commenced the battle of Pharsalia.

"And now, may I point to the moral of this story," concluded the speaker. "Julius Caesar was not always a military genius, for battles previous to the decisive one at Pharsalia clearly indicate that his judgment had not developed. History throughout the ages shows that an ordinary man by good work will beat the genius every time, and the life of Caesar serves as an inspiration to us all to work hard to apply ourselves to mastering the problems of life and to persevering. Gentlemen cadets, you should thank your lucky stars that you have come to a place of learning that makes a man work sometimes, anyway, whether he wants to or not."

Professor Mitchell was loudly applauded on the conclusion of his address, which was extremely interesting through and scintillated with droll humor. He held the cadets enthralled from the moment he announced the subject and his popularity at the college is fully established. The speaker next week will be R. Easton Burns, the well-known Kingston accountant.

IN HARD LUCK.

Four Men Slept at the Police Station on Wednesday Night.

These are days of hard times for some people. The truth of this statement was shown at the police station on Wednesday night, when four men made application for protection. All were accommodated. One of the men taken in is about sixty years of age. He walked to Kingston from Smith's Falls a few days ago, and has been endeavoring to make his way across the border, but so far has been unsuccessful.

VISITED BY THOUSANDS.

Scene of Recent Auto Fatality Attracts Much Attention. Thousands of citizens have visited the scene of the auto accident on Raglan Road, in which Mr. and Mrs. Love lost their lives. All day Tuesday and Wednesday there was almost a steady stream of people visiting the scene. As a result of the car crashing against the tree, a great deal of the bark has been torn off, and the tree stands as a sad reminder of the tragedy.

HAVE COMPLETED THE WORK

New Stack on City Incinerator Put in Place.

The workmen employed by McKelvey & Broth, Limited, have completed the work of erecting the new smoke stack on the city incinerator. The new stack, which is very heavy, was hoisted without any mishap. During the time the workmen were busy getting the stack in place, the garbage was taken out into the country about two and one half miles. To make sure that the new stack will stand the heavy winds, it is all reinforced with heavy steel braces on the inside.

St. George's Scouts.

The weekly meeting of St. George's Scouts was held at St. George's hall Wednesday evening. After the troop had paraded, they were given a most interesting and instructive talk on First Aid by Major Williams, M.C., of the C.A.M.C., which was very much appreciated. The acting Scout Master, Capt. Hind, called for three hearty cheers for Major Williams, which were given in a most enthusiastic way by all present. Some good boxing was staged by the scouts which was conducted by Assistant Scoutmaster, Percy H. Hall. Rev. W. E. Kidd, M.C., of the local committee, is much pleased with the work which is now being carried out by Capt. Hind, and appreciates the help given by those who instruct the troop. Proficiency badges will be presented to the scouts at their next meeting.
