At that time the Church of St John Lateran was the Papal church, and the Schola Cantorum was located there. This was said to have been more like a guild than a school. Its eader was frequently a clergyman of high rank, often a bishop, as music was, from the very start, regarded as a significant part of church worship. Even at that very early transferred to Avignon, where the Pope established a new choir. This was composed of French singers and Flemish singers, some of them fam ous composers. Returning to Rome the Pope took his new body of singers and thus the Papal Choir which had remained in the Eternal City was
